But this desire, as you must know by this, produces its corresponding answer. In the minds, moreover, of such inquirers at public circles are the crudest ideas of our life and its surroundings. When they do ask a question, the lower spirits with whom alone usually they commune in such circles, give them a reply which is the reflex of their minds, cruder and more foolish: and so contradictory and silly stories are current, and we are blamed that we give no information, or that it is foolish and contradictory. It is not we, again, that should be blamed, but those on your side: not spirit, but the material surroundings of your circles. We know well that you will gather from this a sweeping condemnation of public circles and of those who frequent them. It is the usual fault of short-sighted man that his opinions are one-sided and extreme. He is unable to grasp the great truth that there is no unmixed good or evil in his world, and that if there were he would not be fitted to judge of it. We have sufficiently denounced the trivialities and follies of public circles; and we have warned you of the evils they introduce, as well as of the class of spirits who frequent them. We earnestly desire the advent of the time when man's enlightenment will ensure their abolition. But they are in the present state of knowledge what you would call necessary evils. In no other way that can be expected will the great mass of men become familiar with truth, except by gaining it laboriously and picking it up grain by grain out of the great mountain of chaff which is gathered together in such circles. No evil, as such, is final. It eventuates in good; and what seems to your finite gaze so full of mischief, is only the process out of which good is finally evolved. The process is unpleasant, and you do well to wish it over, but it is a necessary pre-requisite to progress. While, therefore, we know far more than you can of the mischiefs wrought by the unspiritual frequenter of circles, we are not willing to join in any sweeping denunciations. We would rather hope and pray for man's enlightenment, for we know full well that when that comes he will no longer desire to have such circles perpetuated. His desires will take a higher flight, and he will learn knowledge more suited to his more progressive state. Ponder this, friend.

Yes, I knew all that before, but in spite of all there is left on many minds a suspicion that there is more than meets the eye to account for the inconsistencies of Spiritualism. Even your explanation reads rather like clever and special pleading. However, you endorse, I see, the idea that Spiritualism is for the cool and clear headed man, who is content to labour and wait for a very gradual evolution of truth; and that for the masses it may be of doubtful benefit. Then public societies are wrong; and the investigation should be in the hands of a few cool savans, and indeed, to what you call my finite reason, it would seem that a thousandth part of the energy displayed on your side, if diverted into proper channels, would produce a thousand times the result, e.g.—If you were to perfect a half dozen experiments which could be shewn at will to anybody, and in any place, and which should prove conclusively your existence and your power, you would do more to prove Spiritualism than all your combined efforts have done yet. Instead of that nothing but confusion prevails, and it is very hard to believe that there is a managing head at all. I cannot agree that the fault is all on our side. We are crude and silly enough, but I have known some disembodied folk who are more foolish still.

Doubtless, even if the spirits of whom you speak were not undeveloped, it is quite possible that they may have been very foolish, seeing that the supply of folly that comes to us from your world is continuous. Respecting your question as to the esoteric nature of the investigation, we have already said that it is well that those only who are fitted mentally, spiritually, and even physically, should enter on the subject. An evenly-balanced mind, a healthy physique, and spiritual aspirations, perseverance, truth-seeking, and courage, are necessary. It is not well that all publicity should cease. You have too much of it, and the zeal is misplaced too often. But all that is necessary in order to maintain the rapport between you and us. It is necessary that general interest should be kept up. You can but moderate undue zeal as far as possible. We have no power nor desire to institute any such experiments as you desiderate. Men must get knowledge in this as in all things else, by laborious toil and gradual experiment. We cannot unseal the pure fount of universal knowledge, and pour it down unwilling throats. Not so does the Supreme work, as you know. The time will come when all such experiments can be done. It is not yet: nor have we either the power or will to force it on. Moreover, you over-estimate much the value of such evidence. It would but render materialists more material still. We would spiritualise. And it is not by such methods that spiritual proof can be given. Cease. You are passing through a phase in which the mind digests and assimilates new truth. We are little disposed to blame you for seeking deep into truth. When you have got a firm hold of what we mean, you will be best able to answer your own objections. The Supreme guard you and us.

+ IMPERATOR.

TRANSITION OF MR. S. CHINNERY.—We learn from The Medium that this old and well-remembered Spiritualist passed away, at his residence in Paris, on the 14th inst.; after a painful and lingering illness. He was one of the very earliest investigators of Spiritualism in Europe, and no man in the cause was more generous, faithful, and devoted. The war in Paris greatly interfered with his usefulness; but before that calamity he took a leading part in all forms of aid to spiritual work and workers.

THE USE OF PRAYER AT SEANCES.—In an article in La Lumière, for June, concerning messages from the "world of spirits" (as Swedenborg generally wrote), the editress says: "Happy the 'groupes' which believe in the efficacy of prayer! There are so many who do not to-day have faith in it, I request the most religious to pray for them. I think our evocation of the spirits is so grave a thing, that, before giving ourselves to it, we should lift our soul to the Giver of all good gifts, that light and protection may be afforded us."

WHAT OUR CONTEMPORARIES SAY.

Narcotics and the Development of Occult Knowledge.

Replying to a "Would-be Yogi" who asked whether total abstinence from the use of tobacco and narcotics is as necessary a condition for the development of Occult knowledge as abstention from wine and spirituous drink, the Theosophist says:—"Narcotic drugs are as much prohibited as spirituous liquors for the development of psychic powers. We know of no work on Yog Vidya where they are recommended. It is no wonder that the Puranas should say that Siva was taking bang, when he and great Rishis like Agastya are represented as having led a married life. In a Telegu work on Occultism we understand that 'Rāmāsāpanam' is recommended as necessary for Yozees. Rāmāsāpanam is the name by which a kind of liquor is known. The word is explained in another work as a technical term for a particular kind of meditation! Occultists have always used conventional terms in their works, the key being entirely in their hands; while such of the outsiders as had spiritual yearnings without the necessary qualifications, began interpreting them exoterically and, perverting the text, adopted such customs. With the growth and popularisation of such practices, self-studying Occultists (?) had diverged farther and farther from the Truth until at last the two systems can no longer be easily reconciled.

An Occultist View of the Teachings of Allan Kardec.

The Theosophist admits that the works of Allan Kardec teach a system of ethics which merits the encomiums generally given it. In this code thousands of young persons are being educated, and beyond doubt they will derive from it great moral strength. Since, however, the doctrines of the Spiritist school are not altogether in harmony with those of Occultists, as regards the condition of man after death and the destiny of his monad, we personally have never been enlisted as a follower of the great French philosophy in question. The morality of a system does not prove its infallibility in respect to its dogmas and other teachings. Who inspired Allan Kardec we cannot tell. In some fundamental respects his doctrines are diametrically opposed to ours. With the Spiritists we believe—let us rather say we know—that man is born more than once as a human being; and this not merely upon this earth, but upon seven earths in this planetary chain, to say nothing of any other. But as to the rapidity with which, and the circumstances under which these re-incarnations occur, our Spiritist friends and ourselves are at variance. And yet despite all differences of opinion, including the very great one about the agency of "departed spirits" in controlling mediums and inspiring books, we have ever been on the friendliest terms with the Kardecists, and had hoped always to remain so. Recent utterances by our friends—hasty, we think, and likely to be recalled upon reflection—have thrown some doubt over the situation; but this is neither here nor there as regards our correspondent's query.

The Occultists do not accept the doctrine of "guardian angels," for reasons heretofore fully explained, in these pages. They do, however, believe most firmly in the personal, divine spirit in man, the source of his inspiration and his all-sufficient "angel" and "guardian." Only adepts can choose their re-incarnations, and even they are strictly limited in their choice by their responsibility to the inexorable law of Karma. According to his Karma-phalla, or the aggregate consequences of his actions, is every man's re-birth and final escape, or emancipation, from the necessity for re-birth determined.

Not all of the Spiritists agree with Allan Kardec by any means. The house seems to be greatly divided. We recommend correspondents to read J. B. Roustaing's "Four Gospels," translated into English by Miss Anna Blackwell and Mr. Kirby.

Organisation amongst Spiritualists.

Speaking of the general failure of even the most promising attempts at organisation amongst Spiritualists in the past, and commenting on methods to be adopted by the new national movement in America, Light for Thinkers says:—"We have tried to build up from the local to the national organisation. It is well to experiment on the reversal. A healthy national organisation will give an impetus to local effort. Commencing by individual representation it will finally grow to a delegated local representation. In this light, we see the present national association of Spiritualists beginning correctly. Therefore, we hope to see a rallying of forces that will make it what it ought to be. If it is not now what it should be, the corrective is with the Spiritualists. They have no right to find fault with what others do when they are doing nothing themselves to further the ends in view. Chronic fault-finders, as a rule, are chronic do-nothings.

We do not advocate the organisation of separate phenomenal and lecture associations, but a combination. An association should be able to take the investigator or novice from the physical phenomena up to the contemplation of the sublimest forces of nature.

Each society should have its mediums for different phases and its lecturer. Whether these should be rotated by temporary engagements or settled definitely, experience will determine. A greater dignity and a higher purpose and a better method for each person to feed his mental desires, will result in the grand outcome of a strong combination. We need protection as Spiritualists. Our mediums need protection. The public want to know where to look for genuine mediumship and where to go in order to learn of those capable of imparting instruction in spiritual truths.

No sinking of individual sovereignty is at all necessary. But a grand combination is possible that will develop us individually in our mental, moral, and spiritual attainments. With this, will come the results of our labours that will bless humanity—for which we should devote ourselves, even though we make personal sacrifices of our own progress. The arguments against organisation seem to us to originate in selfishness and not in the love of humanity that should characterise a progressive Spiritualist.

Paid Mediumship.

Referring to the suggestion that the payment of mediums for their services seems like degradation, tending to blunt the spiritual perceptibilities of those receiving remuneration, the Banner of Light says the idea is very fine, and in a certain sense pretty; but it is not grounded in common sense. But it happens to be so ordered that we cannot here cultivate the spiritual except by first providing for the sustenance of the material. Suppose it were to occupy all the time which a medium has to provide for the needs of the physical life? how is he or she to perform the service to which the spirit-world calls? If any mediums exist who are fortunately not obliged to take thought for the wherewithal of life, such can properly afford to give their services gratuitously; but it is different with those not thus fortunately situated. Inasmuch as they must, at any rate, have a living first, must have the means of existence, it is only reasonable and right that they should receive a sufficient remuneration from those who in turn receive from or through them what they feel they stand in such need of.

On the other hand, the objection is made that there is danger, if mediums are to accept either fixed charges or what may be offered them, that it will tempt them to feign the production of the phenomena when they are not really given by the spirits, in order to secure their customary fee. The objection is at bottom but a trivial one. It will practically apply as well to the platform lecturer, to the writer of books, to the publisher of journals and reviews, that are one and all devoted to the dissemination of the truths of Spiritualism. It is quite as much for the interest of those to have it appear that the claims of Spiritualism are every one of them well grounded, as it is for the interest of the mediums to have it appear that all which is given through them is in no sense simulated. If spiritual mediums are to be indiscriminately discredited and degraded in this way, what would be the good of applying to them at all, whether they are paid or unpaid? The objection thus brought is so broad as to swamp the objector along with those whom he would subject to his criticisms.

SPIRITUALISM IN THE PROVINCES.

EXETER.

Exactly a year ago, the writer of this, having laboured for eighteen months at Plymouth, in the promotion of Spiritualism, proceeded to Exeter, in pursuance of the same mission. A hall was taken in the centre of the city, for Sunday services, and another room for week evening circles. This was no slight undertaking in view of the fact that Exeter is peculiarly a stronghold of ecclesiasticism and conservatism, and, at the time, knew absolutely nothing of Spiritualism. The step taken, however, has been abundantly justified by the result, for our Spiritual movement at once took hold of the minds of the people, and has exerted a steadily progressive influence from that time to the present. We have regularly held, on an average, five meetings every week, and these have been attended from first to last by large numbers of people. At almost every meeting there have been fresh inquirers. A varied, and in some instances, a high order of mediumship has been incipiently called into exercise, and whilst our cause has a peculiarly excellent spiritual basis, we are now being favoured with an increasing selection of highly intelligent and influential inquirers, this affording the best outlook for the future.

The last few days of the official year now completed have been remarkable for the manifestation of interest and activity, and the large audience addressed by the writer on Sunday last, very creditably celebrated the anniversary of our movement.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M. A. (Oxon.)"

It is not a little curious to note the various conceptions of a future state which have been formed by great writers in the past. Homer made the dwellers in Hades mere empty shades, without form, and to be revived to an evanescent vitality only by copious draughts of blood. Tiresias cannot prophesy till he has thus refreshed himself: and his mother cannot recognise him till she too has drunk of "the blood which is the life." To Homer the physical body was the real man: the rest was an empty shade, soon to vanish into nothingness: a sort of analogue to the shell on its way to extinction, which modern speculation has recently revived or evolved. If the body were ill-treated or dishonoured, as by lack of decent burial, the poor cold shade stood shivering until it could enlist the sympathy of some kind friend to perform the fitting obsequies. It was the body that was the great fact.

Turning to Virgil we find the same conception of the sanctity of the body, and of the injury done to the soul by any lack of reverence to it. They who remained unburied were left waiting a hundred years before Charon would ferry them over the infernal river. Infants who had been prematurely removed from the body, which had thus failed of its full development, passed their time in ceaseless wailing. They who have laid sacrilegious hands on the body, and have cut short its life by suicide, are kept in prison willing to endure anything if only they may atone for their sin. The same notion of the body as the real man is everywhere manifest. In Virgil's conception, too, the voices of the dead are thin and shadowy. When the hosts of Agamemnon saw Æneas they would fain have cried aloud, but could not. They had left all that was best of them on earth, when they quitted the body.

In Virgil's conception of the future state we meet with a very distinct idea of re-incarnation. When Æneas saw a great multitude of souls on the banks of a river "thick as the bees on a calm summer's day in a garden of lilies," he was told by the Sibyl that these were souls which had yet to live again in a mortal body. When the worthy had been sent on to Elysium and the plains of the blest, and had been wholly purified, then they drank of the river of Oblivion and returned to the upper world. So it is not the soul that has failed to reap the benefit of its incarnation that returns to the school in which it has once failed. It is the soul that has garnered up its full experience and has been purified and perfected thereby that returns with larger knowledge to add to its experience in another phase of being. As for the unfortunate failure it appears to be consigned to a very gruesome pit, where it suffers such tortures as adorn the mediæval conception of a material hell of fire and brimstone.

Scipio's dream (Cicero de Republica, Book 6) gives a not very dissimilar conception; but we have got rid of the idea that the body is all important. "Do not consider yourself but your body to be mortal. You are not the being which this corporal figure evinces, but the mind of every man is the man, and not the form which may be delineated." In the midst of such sentiments, which shew how grandly the early conception has developed in the direction of spirituality, we have a statement of the inherent divinity of man. "It is divinity that has consciousness, sensation, memory, and foresight: that governs, regulates, and moves that body over which it has been appointed, just as the Supreme Deity rules this world: and in like manner as an Eternal God guides the world, which, in some respects, is perishable, so an eternal spirit animates your frail body." From this the transition is easy to a homily on the reaction of daily pursuits on the soul, and the desirability of cultivating the noblest and purest habits, since "the soul that is stirred and agitated by these will fly the more quickly to this mansion, even to its home; and this will be the more rapid, if even now, while it is imprisoned within the body, it sallies abroad, and contemplating the objects beyond, abstracts itself as much as possible from the body." And then the guide proceeds to say that they who have devoted themselves to corporeal pleasures and have yielded themselves to their baser passions, "when they escape from their bodies hover round the earth, nor do they return to this place till they have been tossed about many ages."

From the same source we get a mystical description of the circles and spheres of earth below the moon, which carries off the mind to Koot Hoomi and his endless gyrations through a course of planets. All things, we are informed, are connected by nine spheres (now there are seven), of which the outermost is Heaven, the dwelling-place of God, the home of "the original principles of those endless revolutions which the planets perform," whatever may be imported by that mystical utterance. Saturn fills one sphere, Jupiter the next, and then Mars. In the middle comes the Sun, "the soul and guide of this world." After him comes Venus, then Mercury, and last of all comes the Moon, in this cosmical scheme as in the later one of Koot Hoomi, the dust-bin of the universe, the home of death and desolation. So there is nothing quite new even in cosmical speculation.*

The account of pearls given through Mrs. A. recalls to my memory a very striking instance of the same phenomenon. I had met that most excellent medium at the house of Mrs. Makdougall Gregory, and we were sitting round the table. The light was full, and perfectly sufficient for the most exact observation. I had previously heard of the materialisation of little pearls through Mrs. A.'s medium-ship, and was both pleased and excited when I suddenly saw two tiny seed-pearls on the table in front of me. With a rapid exclamation I put out my hand and touched them. They melted beneath my finger, and I was told that I had touched them before they were fully materialised. It was promised, at my earnest request, that I should have my pearls if I would keep still. I got them, and I have them still: two little pearls, unpierced, and in no way distinguishable from the little seed-pearls that are of natural growth. Indeed, if I had not touched and destroyed two in my haste, I should have taken them to be apports, and not, as they presumably were, creations. It is a common thing for small objects, such as little gems, to be brought in and placed on the table, but it is very rare that an observer can positively say in any given case that such objects are materialised, to use a clumsy expression. They may be, and to all appearance generally are, natural objects, which the invisible operators assert that they invest with a certain magnetic aura for definite purposes of their own. This is not unintelligible when we reflect that a sensitive can distinguish mesmerised objects with certainty, and that curative properties can assuredly be imparted to material objects by the passes of the mesmeriser. Whether by the potency of faith, or by what occult means, I know not, but I have seen many cases of the cure of pain by such means, and not merely of nervous pain, but of actual injury which under normal medical treatment would have needed some considerable time to relieve.

* I am indebted for much that I have here very inadequately noticed to a curious paper in the Westminster Review on "Classic Conceptions of Heaven and Hell."

M.A. (Oxon.)

PLANCHETTE WRITING.

The only explanation (such as it is) of Planchette writing that I have ever heard, where the good faith of the operators is beyond question, is that it is unconsciously written by one of the operators under the influence of impressions once made on his brain, but possibly quite forgotten. I had lately a striking proof of the inappropriateness of such an explanation.

About the end of September I was staying in a much haunted house, where Mrs. T., the mistress of the house, and her sister frequently write Planchette. They are both highly mediumistic, and sometimes the control of one sister takes direction of the writing, and sometimes of the other. They sit opposite to each other, with one hand at least of each upon the board, so that the writing is upside down to the one and upright to the other, and it is always to the one whose control is operating at the moment, that the writing is upside down. They write with quite as great rapidity as a practised penman, and the board looks like an animated being under their obviously impassive hands.

We had had some Planchette writing on the Sunday afternoon, after which Mrs. T. had put the unused paper back in a cupboard which she kept locked. On Monday after breakfast it was proposed to have some more writing, and Mrs. T. went to her locked cupboard in the dining-room for a supply of paper, when she was surprised to see a reddish-brown smear upon the paper about two inches long, which she felt sure was not there when she put the paper in the cupboard the evening before, nor when she had been to the cupboard once before early in the morning. She brought the paper in to us in the drawing-room, when I observed that the stain was still wet and smeary, and as our thoughts were very full of the ghosts and their doings, and drops of blood had once been found mysteriously spattered all over a writing-table, the thought of ghostly bloodstains at once occurred to us all; but as we were just going to sit down to Planchette, we should probably get positive information from thence. The two sisters sat down, and Mrs. T.'s control at once signed his name, and then proceeded to write "Bloodstains!"

followed by a large mark of admiration. "Can you tell us about this?" we asked. Three taps. "Well, C. J. (Mrs. T.), you opened that cupboard this morning, what for?" Mrs. T.: "To get some medicine I wanted from the bottle." Planchette: "Fetch the bottle and put it on the table; don't examine it." Mrs. T. did so. Planchette: "I sincerely wish I could tell you something grisly, but put the bottle on the paper." This was done, and the mystery was solved. The bottle left a smaller stain on the paper similar to that which had been first observed, obviously arising from some of the medicine (Gregory's mixture) trickling down when the bottle had been opened in the morning. Mrs. T. assured us that she had never thought of the bottle, and it is evident that if a suspicion of such a source of the stain had occurred to her, she would at once have examined the bottle.

A few weeks previous (July 15th) when Mrs. T. and her husband were writing Planchette, the writing intelligence gave them notice of what was taking place in a different part of the house unknown to either of them. About 8.30 Mrs. T. was alone with Jumper (the dog) in the kitchen, and nobody in the house but herself and her husband. She was standing before the fire when she heard a very long wailing cry like a woman's voice, coming from the larder or thereabouts. She had time to hear it, get frightened, and still hear it, before it stopped, for it was very long. The dog pricked up his ears, listened, put his tail between his legs, and rushed into his box, where he lay shivering. Mrs. T. went into the larder and all about, but there was no one either there or outside. She felt very much frightened and turned quite cold. She locked up all the doors, and went into the dining-room to tell her husband, and after searching all over the house they sat down to write Planchette. While writing they heard two low cries in the room, and a great deal of movement like the rustling of a dress in the corner. Planchette admitted that the noise was spiritual and bad, though it would not say by whom made. It suddenly told them to go and fetch Jumper, who had been left in the kitchen. They went, and found the poor dog crouching in the wicker chair, not daring to move, even when called, and shaking all over as if in dreadful terror. Planchette told them that if they had left him alone he would have died of fright or had a fit.

THE CENTRAL ASSOCIATION OF SPIRITUALISTS.
New Arrangements.

We are requested to draw attention to the fact that the rooms of this Association at 38, Great Russell-street, W.C., are now open every day from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m., during which time visitors can use the reading room, exchange books from the library, &c. In addition to this the rooms will be open every Monday, Wednesday and Friday evening from 7 to 9 p.m., when either the Hon. Sec. or some member of the Council will be in attendance to receive visitors, friends or inquirers, and to transact generally the business of the Association. If it is found that the opening of the rooms in the evening meets a felt want, opportunity will be taken to extend the facility. In the meantime our readers will help the C.A.S. if they will inform inquirers and others that the Council will be happy to see any such, and will be the better pleased the more the rooms are used.

THREE CASES OF SPONTANEOUS
CLAIRVOYANCE,
TOGETHER WITH PROLONGED ABSTINENCE FROM SOLID FOOD.

"A Service of Suffering, or leaves from the Biography of Mrs. Croad, formerly of Reading and Swindon, now residing at Redland, Bristol. With extracts from her writings." Also, "Poems by the late Miss F. R. Havergal and other friends who have witnessed some of the incidents in her unparalleled history." Compiled by J. G. Westlake. Second edition. "Truth is Stranger than Fiction."

London: W. Mack, 4, Paternoster-square, and 38, Park-street, Bristol.*

In the preface to the second edition of this unpretending and curious little book, its author tells us that within four months an edition of 3,000 copies was sold. We presume, from the tone in which the narrative is presented to the public, that these 3,000 copies will have found readers among the orthodox religions. Its subject-matter is, also, such as to make it well worth the consideration of another, though by no means so widely spread a body—namely, the body of students of Psychology.

Mr. Westlake, the compiler, regards the history of this suffering lady as "unparalleled." To this broad assertion the readers of "LIGHT" will demur, however remarkable and interesting the experiences of Mrs. Croad may appear. The interest to them will mainly consist in discovering for this lady her proper niche in the edifice, so to speak, which the labourers in the science of mind are busied in erecting.

The case of a lady, a patient of the celebrated Sir Hans Sloane may be, with profit, glanced at before we consider in greater detail the case of Mrs. Croad. The writer in the "Yorkshire Spiritual Tracts" (p. 89, article, "The Inner Light,") who there gives a condensed amount of the phenomena manifested above a hundred years ago, in the patient of Sir Hans Sloane, says: "To describe fully and circumstantially the sufferings of the lady would be too tedious; suffice it that I acquaint the reader that she was recovering from the small-pox, when one day her friends found her quite dumb and stone blind. In that state she lingered three-quarters of a year, being, for the same period, denied daily food, save in the form of liquid or essence, for no solids could be made to pass down the throat. Sir Hans Sloane, and all the skill that the faculty could bring to bear, seemed to stand on the dark side of so mysterious a case. Their efforts were in vain to give her relief, but what was their amazement to see her sit down and write in the most orderly, polished style of penmanship, the subject-matter of which we are not favoured with; probably inspirations. But one thing we are assured of, that if in her composition a word was omitted, she carefully corrected it and placed a caret under the exact place of said omission. Think of this, reader, she was stone-blind! A pincushion of most exquisite workmanship was also, together with other beautiful and curious needlework, performed by her during that three-quarters of a year of suffering! A clergyman, drawn with others to visit her, seeing her writing, placed his hat over the candle, but she continued to write, and at length lifting her hand knocked away the sceptic's hat. Before her affliction her highly sensitive nature caused her to shudder at thunder and lightning; but now she would sit close to the window during a storm, as if, with her sightless eyes, she delighted to gaze upon the elemental war. (It is needless to say that she was not a mesmeric patient; for Franz Anton Mesmer was then in his infancy; he was born in 1743.) I may add that we hear of the poor deaf and blind lady always taking the hand of those present to ascertain whether or not they were strangers to her. The hand seemed to be her only earthly communicative link with those around her. It was by a system of hand-talking also, that she caused them to know her voiceless words from the time when she became dumb to the day of her death.

"It was truly astonishing, one would think, to the savans of that day, who had entré through Sir Hans Sloane, to behold the 'clear-seer'—for such she must have been—point out the colours in an apron worn by a lady who was present, telling her it was embroidered with blue, green, red and pink. She could tell which was pink, although so near one of the other colours, viz., red. She had a great dislike to have strangers brought into her presence. One day her sister invited her out of the room, which she usually sat in, into the parlour. At first she assented, but finding that strangers were there anxious to see so strange a case, she was indignant, and made signs that her sister wished to deceive her: 'There were strangers present,' she said; and nothing could induce her to go in. Thus they were convinced that she possessed a sight and knowledge beyond their finding out; and they increased in brilliancy of perception as she drew near to her end. In short, she appears to have become less and less of material clay, and more of pure spirit." (Unfortunately this writer does not furnish further detail of the phenomena manifested, nor yet give reference as to where this interesting account may be met with in the original.) Similar instances of clairvoyant condition spontaneously developing are not, however, so rare as might be at first supposed.

Elizabeth Squirrell.

Amongst the remarkable cases on record of spontaneous clairvoyance produced by disease, perhaps the most interesting in England, may assuredly be said to be that of Elizabeth Squirrell, of Shottesham. Her autobiography,* with selections from her writings, was, in 1853, published in London, by Messrs. Simpkin, Marshall and Co. This narrative has been quoted by various writers in the Spiritual Magazine, and Howitt, in History of the Supernatural, Vol. II., pp. 227 to 231, gives a short sketch of her extraordinary history. He says:—

"Amongst the most remarkable spirit mediums of modern times is Elizabeth Squirrell, whose revelations took place before Spiritualism, in its present advent in England, had taken place. Elizabeth Squirrell may be said to be the seeress of Shottesham, as Mrs. Haule was the seeress of Prevorst. There is a striking similarity in these cases. Both had their bodily frames so weakened by disease, and their nervous systems so excited, that the spiritual life within predominated over the bodily life without; the communion with the spiritual world was opened up, and they became not only clairvoyant of what was around them, but prophetic of what was approaching. Both were maligned and charged with imposture; and both found some candid people who were ready to examine thoroughly into the case, and thus became witnesses to the honesty of the accused, and to the extraordinary nature of their visitations.

Elizabeth Squirrell was born at Shottesham, in Norfolk, (five miles from Woodbridge, and thirteen from Ipswich), in 1838. Her father appears to have been in trade there, and was the son of the Baptist minister of Sutton, a neighbouring village. At three years of age she fell into a severe illness, which probably laid the foundation of her future malady, though she recovered her health daily to school and back, six miles altogether. It appears to have been in her twelfth year that she was suddenly attacked with illness at school, and these attacks grew more and more complicated for years. At first she experienced a weakness in the back, a severe pain and pressure on the head, then violent epileptic fits, spasmodic contractions, paralysis of the limbs, and eventually loss of power to swallow, lock-jaw, which continued twenty-one weeks, and finally she lost sight and hearing. Her sense of smell disappeared in the nose, but she could inhale odours through the mouth. All her senses except feeling were shut up. Doctor after doctor was called in, who attributed her complaint to as many causes as there were doctors. * * * It was soonnoised abroad that this poor girl, when about fourteen or fifteen, had lost all power to swallow, and had lived without taking any nourishment whatever for twenty-five weeks. The thing was denied (as impossible) though there are numerous cases of the kind on record.* There was a great rush of people to see the case, and a loud outcry of imposture succeeded. Both she and her parents were accused of being in complicity to deceive, for the purpose of obtaining money. Three separate committees were appointed of watchers. The second, on which there were several clergymen, imagined that they had discovered fraud, and broke up, quarrelling among themselves, and setting abroad the most damaging reports. A third and still more vigorous watch of twelve persons was appointed, who reported, everyone signing his or her own statement; all most unequivocally asserting that no food could possibly have been taken during fourteen days' watch, night and day, the parents being excluded from the room. All declared their conviction that both parents and child were honest, conscientious people, and that Elizabeth herself was not only innocent of all deceit, but was a very sincerely religious and highly-gifted girl. Various medical men of more liberal character visited her, and, after careful examination and inquiry, confirmed this opinion. Amongst these, Dr. Johnson, of Umberslade, published a very interesting visit to her. Dr. Garth Wilkinson and Dr. Spencer T. Hall, both gentlemen well acquainted with such cases, gave decided opinions on the truth of her extraordinary condition. Some clergymen were equally fair, and amongst them the Rev. W. A. Norton, of Alderton. But this did not prevent the Baptist Society at Stoke-Green, Ipswich, expelling both parents and daughter, because they asserted that Elizabeth had for more than a quarter of a year lived without taking sustenance; and still worse, because she asserted that she had seen angels and departed spirits.

"In fact, the poor girl had become a thoroughly clairvoyant subject. She saw spirits about her, amongst them her guardian angel; and in her mesmeric sleep she saw her own internal condition, the seat and nature of her complaints, and could distinctly, in these sleeps, foretell the approach of great illness, or of alleviation, when she should be able to swallow again, and when a return of her inability to swallow would occur. In her waking condition she knew nothing whatever of what she had seen or said in her mesmeric sleep; and her attendants, wisely, did not communicate this to her, so that they could judge of her truthfulness and consistency. In her mesmeric sleeping, she spoke of her waking condition as of another person, as if two spirits occupied one body, one sleeping as the other awoke, and vice versa. She always called her waking condition 'My waking,' and said 'My waking is very ill—very ill indeed'; or 'My waking will suffer so and so'; but always added, 'It does not know this, and don't you tell it for it would distress it.' The attendants always found her prognostics occur to the letter, and exactly as to time. * * * An eminent London surgeon, who went down to see her, says with much truth: 'I am quite of opinion that Elizabeth Squirrell possesses extraordinary genius for her years, and that all she says teems with so much good sense, good taste,

* An invaluable record of cases of long abstinence from food was published in pamphlet form some years ago by Mr. William M. Wilkinson, with reference to the extraordinary and pitiful history of "The Welsh Fasting Girl."

and genuine piety, that all she utters deserves to be preserved. Her powers of sight and hearing being obliterated, of course she is desirous to hold communion with herself; this constitutes a new existence!" He adds, 'It is most shameful that people should prejudice this case. I confess that I went down with one impression and returned with another.' But all were not so self-reliant, or so charitable as this liberal medical man. The parents of Elizabeth were ruined in their trade, and compelled, from the persecuting spirit of those about them, to remove to Ipswich to endeavour to get a livelihood. Elizabeth has since been in London, supporting herself as a needlewoman. On inquiry after her I understood that she was again gone down into the country. With only a simple village education, she writes with a spirit and vigour, a sound sense, that few persons possess at any time of life. Like the Sceress of Prevorst, she wrote a good deal of poetry, and in a very sweet and genuine vein."

ON OBSESSION AND ITS ACTION ON HUMAN BEINGS.

M. Hippolyte, the well-known healing medium of Paris, has communicated to the Revue Spirite the following observations, made during the exercise of his gift as a healer:—

"Obsession is defined as the persistent action of disorderly spirits upon individuals, offering characteristics varying from merely moral influence to profound disturbance of the organic and mental faculties. Such action is recognisable, in mania, epilepsy, and hysteria, in cases where, after a crisis, the patient exhibits a state in which there is an effacement of his selfhood and presentation of a new character; a state controllable by the magnetic action of beneficent spirits, co-operating with that of a healing medium upon the patient's organism, and with his moral force upon the obsessing spirit.

"In some cases the obsessing spirit recognises the action of the healing medium, and his ability to help him out of his disordered state. Then, in proportion to the increase of magnetic or nervous health and of mental light in the patient, the obsessing spirit's action weakens, finally to end with spiritual progress on all sides. The following cases are illustrative:—

"Albert P., aged seven, was brought by his mother and another relative from the country. He had had epileptic fits since he was three months old. I witnessed one; in it were exerted the strength and activity of a man in frenzied anger. When the crisis had passed, his tongue was paralysed. On inquiry into family history, I learned that Madame P. had an elder son sound in health, who was the darling of his grandparents, while her maternal affection was fixed upon this one; that she and her father-in-law, in whose house she lived, had had a violent quarrel about the distribution of his property between his grandchildren; that he died before the heat of the quarrel subsided. Albert was then but a few weeks old. The mother had continued with her mother-in-law the strife about the property. The child's epilepsy developed itself when he was twelve weeks old, and fits recurred irregularly.

"I pointed out to Madame P. the wrong of having quarrelled with close relations, especially as she and her children seemed dependent upon them. I urged the rectification of this wrong, that this was important for the child's recovery. I magnetised him daily for a week, and reiterating my exhortations, sent them back to the country.

"It must take some time for nervous equilibrium to become re-established, but I had the satisfaction to receive, a few weeks after their return, the news that Albert was well in general health, that he retained the calmness which the magnetisation had induced, and that harmony now existed in the family.

The Glasgow Trance-Painting Medium.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I have read with interest the account of the presentation of a testimonial to Mr. D. Duguid published in your columns. I am however sorry the amount subscribed is not more in accordance with the services rendered to the cause.

I can speak from personal experience and testify to the fact that Mr. Duguid gave his noble talents gratis, which, I consider, have been of immense service to the cause of Spiritualism. It is never too late to perform a duty and good action, or to rectify an omission—more properly speaking a neglect,—therefore I have much pleasure in enclosing a guinea, which I hope may be added to by other friends to swell the amount to a sum more in proportion to the service rendered.—Yours truly,

A JERSEY CHRISTIAN SPIRITUALIST.

More Perplexed Still.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I am still perplexed. "A Catholic Priest" is "not of the Roman fold alone." But if he be, as his words imply, of the Roman fold at all he can be of none other; and if he be of the Greek communion—which is the only other Church recognised in his last letter as Catholic—he cannot be of the Roman too. Whether Greek, or Roman, or neither, the title he uses to pass off the strange farrago of theology which he has treated us to is a misnomer. Such heresy would be tolerated in no Church, Catholic or otherwise.

My perplexity is increased by the letter of Mr. Atkinson's which immediately follows that of the soi-disant "Catholic Priest." What, in the name of common sense, is the meaning of this bewildering sentence? "May I say a word on the great mistake on the attempt to fathom the nature of 'the great First Cause least understood,' itself without a cause—what must to us be occult and unintelligible, the incomprehensible of the Christian, the noumenon of Kant, 'the unknowable absolute' of Herbert Spencer, the unfathomable of all—so that all speculation in respect to it must be mere fancy and untrue in a misuse of the human understanding resting on particulars observed in daylight experience—a mind in nature, or a being outside nature."

That is, indeed, "saying a word," but is any human being a whit the wiser for it?

I am still more perplexed, if possible, by Mr. Sinnett's reply to Mr. Kiddle. That latter gentleman places side by side two passages from which it appears that Mr. Sinnett's invisible instructor has committed a very manifest act of plagiarism. Not only this but he has omitted inconvenient words, and has so distorted the ideas he has borrowed as to divert them from their original intention to suit his own very different purpose. Mr. Sinnett, like the rest of us, knows nothing of his instructor beyond his instructions. Yet he regards what I suppose everybody else will consider a very grave charge, one which, unless disproved, strikes at the very root of the pretensions of the adepts, as "trivial," "rather out of date now," and "merely ridiculous." That does indeed perplex and surprise me.

A PERPLEXED READER.

A PRINTER'S BLUNDER.—There are many stories regarding printers' blunders, but one of the most remarkable is doubtless that of "Men of the Time," edition 1856, in which the then Bishop of Oxford is thus described:—"Oxford, Bishop of (Rt. Rev. Samuel.) A more kind-hearted and truly benevolent man does not exist. A sceptic as regards religious revelations (sic), he is yet an out-and-out believer in spirit manifestations." The error is easily explained; the lines had been "dropped," as the printers term it, from "Owen (Robert), of Lanark," on to the broad shoulders of Dr. Wilberforce, who heartily enjoyed the obvious blunder, and it is said he took some trouble to procure a copy of the soon-suppressed issue for his private library.—Cassell's Saturday Journal.

WILLIAM BLAKE A SPIRITUALIST.—In one of his letters to a friend, William Blake, the painter, wrote: "I am not ashamed, afraid or averse to tell you, what ought to be told, that I am under the direction of messengers from Heaven daily and nightly. But the nature of such things is not, as some suppose, without trouble or care; temptations are on the right hand and on the left."

"In cases of obsession, it must be remembered that the patient is not alone to be considered. There is the obsessing spirit, who may, instead of accepting light and direction, be exasperated, and instigate the patient to resist the medium's influence and counsels; and thus prayerful effort to re-instate him may be rendered unavailing.

"The struggle of a disorderly spirit to hold on to a victim, for the sake of satisfying perverted appetites, is sometimes felt by those who, if sensitive, are ministering to the patient.

"Two young work-women were brought to me; they had been under hospital treatment eighteen months; one for epilepsy, the other for hysterical fits and nervous lameness. The victim of epilepsy had an unsympathetic, wandering look. I ascertained that she frequented certain objectionable society. I urged that if she wished to be cured she must renounce such society. She promised. The effect of the first few magnetisations was such that I augured the best results. But then we lost ground. She had lapsed into her old habits. I felt that my means of action were nullified. She is now an inmate of a public asylum for epileptics.

"Between this and the other, there was a great difference; the countenance of the latter was engaging and quiet except when she felt the premonition of a fit, the invasion of which she could not resist by the most strenuous effort of her will. She was free from low tendencies. She comprehended and seconded the counsels I gave her. How radiant her countenance became, when, by the power acting through the healing medium, the spirit who had obsessed her withdrew, leaving to her the feeling of restored interior freedom! Some attempts were made by the spirit to return, but to her continued joy, his rapport could not be renewed. Health speedily came back to her. She has developed into a medium for clairvoyant examinations.

"Many have become convinced of the unseen presence of spirits, by communications received through mediums, and they have desired to become mediums themselves. For some of these it would have been better if they had confined themselves to the study of serious communications through serious mediums. All new converts should be instructed, if they are mediumistic, to prepare themselves seriously for the exercise of the gift of mediumship; they should not be left to learn by experience that there are spirits ever seeking for opportunities to act in a disorderly way upon those who are still in earthly bodies. Circles or seances under unwise direction, where mental and moral harmony are absent, offer the conditions for such spirits exercising their influence, an influence difficult for sensitives to throw off. The unintelligent and doubtful results of such ill-regulated seances should warn sitters. Rapport with a spirit should not be lightly welcomed. A circle, like an individual, should keep under the shield of prayer. If we have at heart the injunction, 'Pray without ceasing!' and act in accord with it, we place ourselves under the guardianship of spirits higher than ourselves. I have had much correspondence on this subject, shewing that where spirit communication has been sought without such interior sanction, sensitive individuals have fallen under a psychic or magnetic influence, which has resulted, if not in obsessions, in nervous disorders of various degrees, exhibiting themselves in impairment of moral, mental, or organic health."

WHAT HAS SPIRITUALISM DONE?—It has experimentally demonstrated that spirits are a reality; that there is another life for the human soul; that a man makes his character by his acts; that his happiness depends upon his character; that it is easier to reform here than there; that the status of his enjoyment is equal to the sum total of his life-work, and that a pure life is the guarantee of the divinest happiness.—J.H.H.

The supernatural is nothing else than the sovereign intervention of Divine Liberty in history.—Ernest de Bunsen.

MESMERISM BY E. GURNEY AND FRED. W. H. MYERS.

(IN THE Nineteenth Century FOR OCTOBER, 1883.)

Few of our readers will need any assurance on our part that the gentlemen whose names appear at the head of this column, are doing good work for the advancement of psychological science, not only in their capacity as joint authors of this and other papers, on psychical research, in the principal quarterlies of the day, but also as individual members of the "S.P.R." It would be almost impossible to over-estimate the value of the records which have already appeared, and the present paper is no unworthy addition to a very valuable series.

This, the first article on the specific subject mentioned in the title, deals mainly with the fundamental question as to the reality of the mesmeric force; in other words, of the reality of the specific facts of mesmerism, whether mingled with, or standing beyond and distinct from, those of Hypnotism. In a concluding article they hope to deal with some further departments of the subject, including what they designate as "the vexed questions" of clairvoyance, phreno-mesmerism and mesmeric healing.

The authors of the paper before us proceed very cautiously. This is well. One of the first axioms of successful scientific study has been festina lente, and Messrs. Gurney and Myers act wisely in making very sure of the ground beneath their feet, even at the risk of being considered somewhat hypercritical. There is very evident trace of the extreme care taken by them to verify their facts and in our opinion their report in no way loses in value thereby.

They start by pointing out that as regards mesmerism two very common and not altogether unnatural objections to subjects sui generis, cannot fairly apply. So far from being liable to the damning description of superstition, the facts are wholly independent of any occult philosophy, and claim to be practically as much a modern discovery as the antiseptic treatment of wounds. And in the second place they are definite and reproducible, being neither elusive nor obscure.

Bearing this in mind, the wonder is to account for the small measure of attention which has been accorded to phenomena so eminently impressive, and which have more than once been so impressively put before the world. They say:—

"No other subject, assuredly, which has drawn forth such a report as that of the French Academy of Medicine in 1831, has been subsequently allowed to fall into utter neglect. The territory at which science used to cast fascinated if somewhat dubious glances has simply ceased to attract the explorer's eye; and meeting after meeting of the British Association passes without so much as a mention of its name. Even opposition has languished; or, rather, it now takes the form not of attacking the offending doctrines, but of shutting the door on them. For while it is true that, under the name of Hypnotism, the subject has after a long interval reappeared on the scientific horizon, and many of the phenomena commonly called 'mesmeric' have lately received a good deal of valuable attention, the theories which would confine the field of Mesmerism to these phenomena are based on observation so limited that the slightest general scientific interest would have sufficed to shew its inadequacy."

Passing briefly in review the more obvious phenomena as presented in public mesmeric entertainments and which need no detailed description here, as most of our readers will probably be well acquainted with their general features, Messrs. Gurney and Myers consider that as phenomena apart from theory they cannot be denied—the hypothesis of collusion, which naturally first suggests itself, being rapidly negated by the indiscriminate acceptance of any volunteer who presents himself as a subject. They continue:—

"Clearly, then, if the facts do not excite the attention of experts, it must be that they are supposed to have been already explained and done with. And, in truth, a theory has been propounded, the apparent sufficiency of which has been a very main factor in that lulling of scientific curiosity on the subject to which we have adverted—a theory the more harmful to the extension of knowledge in that it contains a large amount of truth, and with a little straining will cover, for example, nearly all the phenomena above described. The theory may be most comprehensively designated as that of suggestion. It entirely negatives the idea of any direct effect of the organism or will of the operator on the organism or will of the 'subject,' and it attributes the effects produced to a suspension of volitional or directive power in the 'subject,' and the entire engrossment of his faculties by any idea which is presented to him ab extra. As so far described, however, the theory is clearly not in any way an explanation, but a simple statement of the condition in which the 'subject' obviously is: the question is, how, if the operator produces no specific effect on him, is he brought into that condition?"

"For the present we must be content to give in a rather summary fashion some of the conclusions which we are quite prepared to defend in detail. We may briefly say, therefore, that the question, How does suggestion operate? has both a mental and a physical side, and has received replies from both points of view."

First, Dr. Carpenter is tackled upon his "automatic mental action" theory, which is shown to fail in covering the whole ground, while on the other hand the physical side as approached by Braid and Heidenhain appears to demonstrate "that the peculiar state of exaltation, merging into coma, which mesmerists had ascribed to the operation of their specific effluence, could be induced by a particular strain of the muscles of the eye, a prolonged upward and inward squint, which the subject could effect for himself without any one to mesmerise him. And it has been gradually discovered that this 'hypnotic' state, as Braid termed it, may be induced by other methods of 'fixation,' other ways of adjusting the nervous system to a uniform or rhythmically recurring stimulus. Light monotonous stroking on the face, the tick of a watch in the ear—even such small causes as these, if the attention be steadily fixed on them, may suffice to bring about, in sensitive persons, this peculiar nervous change."

THE HAUNTED HOUSE IN ZANTE.

By CAPTAIN E. J. S. RAE.

From the "Theosophist," for September.

This they hold to be a true discovery. But it does not cover all the ground, and in reply to the query why they insist on the existence of mesmerism as well as hypnotism—i.e., on the reality of this supposed specific influence of one person upon another, which lies so far out of the main track of physiological speculation, their answer is, that the reality of this specific influence is forced upon us by a number of unmistakable facts, which cannot fail to strike every experimenter if he will only make experiments enough.

It is contended that the objection to the sufficiency of the hypnotic explanation, from the fact that some persons can operate successfully, and others cannot, has never been realised or met.

They emphasise their position as follows:—

"There are all varieties both of power and of susceptibility, but if we take a casual group of persons, omitting those who are in no degree susceptible, we shall probably find that they may be arranged somewhat in the following order. A and B can hypnotise themselves, either by the inward or upward squint, or, as it may sometimes seem, by mere imagination and expectancy. C and D cannot hypnotise themselves, but can be hypnotised by gentle rhythmical stroking at the hand of almost anyone. E and F can be slowly and partially affected by almost anyone, but immediately and thoroughly by a given mesmerist, X. And the rest of the letters of the alphabet can be sent into the sleep-waking state by X, and by X alone, even though they may have no previous notion that X can affect them—nay, even though they are distinctly told that it is not X but Y who will be able to control them. In such a case—as we have ourselves seen—Y may be as Go'iah and X as David in comparison, but the big man will not succeed in doing in an hour what the small man who has the specific gift will do in five minutes."

"Secondly: just as X alone can send these persons into the trance, so X alone can awake them out of it. It is very easy to take care that the subject shall have no previous notion that X alone will be able to wake him; and, as a matter of fact, the most striking illustrations of this thesis are cases where every one present, mesmerist included, is new to mesmerism, and believes that anyone who chooses can wake any subject up again. The typical case is somewhat as follows. A group of persons at an evening party begin to mesmerise each other in joke. One of the guests sends a schoolboy to sleep, and drives off, thinking nothing more about it. At the end of the evening the boy's parents try to wake him up. They cannot do so! The boy begins to rave, and is worse when touched or spoken to. Next morning they send in alarm for the guest who has done the mischief. He succeeds in waking the boy, but the experiment is followed by a week of headache and depression."

The reality of the mesmeric effluence is, they contend, further shewn by the distress and even danger which sometimes follow on cross mesmerisation—on passes, that is to say, made by Z upon a person whom X has already mesmerised, and over whom X may make passes as often as he likes with only a soothing result. Now in such a case Z's passes may very probably have no effect whatever; but in a specially sensitive "subject" they sometimes bring about a state of mental chaos, of alternating violence and bewilderment, which, though it almost always subsides after a time, is a real risk against which experimenters in mesmerism must before all things be on their guard.

The result of their private experiments are then given. With these our readers are already familiar, and at this point we may well close the first part of our running summary of a very valuable paper. We shall conclude it next week, and in the meantime would recommend all who conveniently can do so, to obtain the current number of the Nineteenth Century, and read the article in extenso.

THE PROGRESS OF SPIRITUALISM.—The cause of Spiritualism continues to make rapid progress both in our own country and in all others. It is fast becoming the cause of the nations of the earth. It is all the more vigorous and expansive because it has kept outside of the compressing limitations of institutions, and has gone wherever human hearts were ready to welcome its approach. It offers demonstration, while it inspires a new and profounder faith.—Banner of Light.

During the winter of 1857, I was stationed in command of the left wing of my regiment, the 91st Highlanders, in the Island of Zante (one of the Ionian Islands). The house allotted to me in my capacity of Commandant and Paymaster, had been previously occupied by a Captain Tucker and Lieutenant Applegarde, of the 57th Light Infantry, whom we had come to relieve. Captain Tucker had held the same appointment that I was ordered to take up. This gentleman asked me if I intended residing in the house, which was set apart by the Barrack Department as the one fixed upon for the officer holding the appointment that I did. My reply was, "Certainly. It seems a nice large house, and beautifully situated near the sea. In every way it appears to be a most desirable residence. Why do you ask?" Captain Tucker then, with great reluctance, told me that he firmly believed the house was haunted! and that he found it impossible to live in it on account of the strange and totally unaccountable noises that were constantly heard in various parts of the house, both by day and by night, such as heavy footsteps, as if some one of no light weight were ascending and descending the stairs from basement to attic. I must here state that this house was built as follows. First, the ground floor, which consisted of kitchen, store-room and two servants' rooms. Second storey, dining-room, drawing-room and a small room with balcony, overlooking the sea, which approached within a few feet of the walls of the house. The third storey, two large bedrooms, with dressing-rooms, &c., &c. The noises and disturbances complained of by Captain Tucker and his friend and their servants, were described as being quite unlearnable. Night after night they used to hear first as if several doors and windows were being violently slammed as if repeatedly opened and shut by some one in a great passion. Then a crash as of a quantity of crockery being smashed and thrown from the top of the stairs to the bottom, then a pause, and tramp, tramp, tramp, would be heard on the staircase as if some one shod with heavy boots were deliberately ascending from the basement of the house to the very attic. Captain Tucker, his friend and the two soldiers declared that in spite of their utmost vigilance and constant watching, they never once saw anybody or anything in any part of the house to account for these mysterious noises and disturbances. However, it was more than they could put up with, so they "hooked it," locked up the evil house, and hired another a good distance away. Now I must say I felt very uncomfortable when I heard all this, especially as the story was corroborated by every one in the town. My wife was quite a young woman, about eighteen, her sister was a little girl of twelve, and the servant maids were very ignorant, superstitious young Greek women. If they heard all these dreadful stories, good-bye to my occupying the house. So I begged of the two officers to say nothing about the place to anyone. I was determined to live in it and find out from personal experience whether all I had heard was true or not—at any rate I could not afford to rent another house sufficiently large for my household. So the following morning after our arrival in the island, in we went, bag and baggage. For the first week or so, nothing unusual occurred; but one morning after parade (11 o'clock) I was seated busy with some regimental accounts in the room overlooking the sea. Two sergeants of my regiment were with me. I had had occasion to leave the room and go into the drawing-room to look for some document I had left there. So I walked along the passage, and at the further end, close to the drawing-room door, I saw a woman dressed completely in black and with a thick black veil drawn down over her face, standing as if she had knocked at the door and was waiting to be admitted. Thinking it was some poor widow with a petition, I merely glanced at her, and as the passage was rather narrow I stopped for a moment for her to let me pass, but as she never moved, I said, as I gently pushed her to one side, "Pardon, madame. Que voulez vous?" She stood perfectly still but did not answer. I then turned the handle of the door and going in said to my wife:—"There is a woman outside the door who evidently wants to speak to you; she does not seem to understand French. Go and see what she wants." Having found the document I required I left the room, my wife having just before done the same. "Why," said she, "where is the woman you said was standing here just now?" As I was very busy I answered, "Oh! I don't know; very likely she has gone down to the kitchen to talk to your maids." My wife at once went down and asked the servants (there were four of them, viz., two soldiers and the two maids) where the woman in black was. They all replied that no such person had been seen by any one of them! No one could possibly have come up to the drawing-room passage without coming first through the kitchen. The front door of the house opening into a lane,—where there were no other houses, only a very high stone-wall,—was always kept carefully locked and bolted and seldom or never used by us. On this occasion it was locked as usual, and the key was kept by one of the soldiers. No one had seen this woman except myself and the two sergeants who had a full view of the passage when I went out. These two sergeants were perfectly astonished when I told them what had occurred, but they both said, "Ah! sir, the 57th men told us this house was haunted, but never said a word about any woman in black or white ever having been seen either by night or by day. Better leave the house, sir; it has a very bad name." I was very much annoyed and disgusted, especially when I found my wife in a great state of alarm, the maid-servants having just heard of the mysterious appearance and disappearance of the woman in black. They too had a long story to tell of what they had heard in the town. So there was consternation and weeping and wailing in my hitherto quiet and cheerful house. Of course I was entreated to leave forthwith, but as the veiled lady had done none of us any other harm than frightening the women folk, I sternly refused to comply, little thinking that in a short time I should be the first to take the initiative and leave the accursed house with the greatest pleasure. About a fortnight or so after this mysterious visitation, I went with my wife and little sister-in-law to the opera to hear a celebrated prima donna who had just come to the island from Italy. We stayed till the performance was over, about 12 o'clock p.m. We were accompanied home by a couple of my brother officers, who stayed and had some supper with us and then left. Before retiring to bed I carefully examined every door and window, locking and bolting every one of them with my own hands. I turned in and was just falling asleep when I heard a noise as of some one walking upstairs from the kitchen towards the dining-room. Thinking it was one of the soldier servants about to remove the things from the supper table, I took no notice of it, but my wife, who also heard the noise, asked me who could be moving about, as none of the servants had attended upon us at supper and were all in bed. Just as she had spoken we both heard heavy footsteps coming up the stairs towards our bedroom. Up, up, they came, and then the handle of our door was turned sharply several times and the door violently shaken. The door was locked inside. I jumped out of bed, and in spite of my wife's terrified entreaties, seized my revolver and rushed at the door, unlocked it, and holding the pistol at arm's length shouted, "Who is that?" There was no one near the door, nor was there any indication of any one retreating down the steps. The noise I made, opening the door and shouting, awoke my sister-in-law and the two maids, who all slept together in the adjoining bedrooms. Out they all bundled in an awful fright screaming and crying. I told them to go into the room where my wife was and stay there until I had examined the lower part of the house. This they were very glad to do as they were frightened out of their seven senses. Lighting a candle and revolver in hand downstairs I went, but had hardly got halfway down when there was a terrific crash as if the supper table with all its burthen of plates, dishes, knives, forks, Argand lamp, &c., &c., had been suddenly overturned, smash upon the floor. Oh, thought I, Tucker's story is true after all. However, down I rushed, revolver on full cock, and breathing dire vengeance on the destroyer of my crockery. When I got to the foot of the stairs I saw a figure in a very scanty shirt emerging from the top of the lower stairs. This figure had a very bushy pair of red whiskers and moustaches to match. Ha, thought I, here is the destroyer of my domestic peace and happiness, I'll pay him off now. Stand! you blackguard, or you're a dead man! "Don't shoot me, sir," said or rather howled a familiar voice. Ha, ha! The apparition was only my faithful henchman, Develin by name, who having also heard the noises that we had, jumped out of his bed and arming himself with a bayonet, had come up to see what was the occasion of all the row. Together we carefully searched every nook and corner upstairs and down, but not a thing could we see or find out. Every door and window was closely shut and fastened inside. I may here say not a single article was found broken. The following day I mentioned what had occurred to several Zantiote gentlemen. They did not seem a bit surprised, but merely said they knew perfectly well I should not stay long in the house, as it was a notorious fact that the place was, and had been haunted for a great many years. I then asked if there were any story connected with the place. They replied that some twenty years ago a number of men, well-known to the authorities, occupied this house. They were suspected to be both smugglers and pirates. Fearful orgies often took place amongst these ruffians. The police, who were very few in number, were afraid to go near the place. One night there was a dreadful uproar. Pistols were fired, and there were the sound of swords and knives clashing, terrible oaths and yells. Towards morning the uproar had ceased, and at daylight two large fellucca boats put off from the beach, under the balcony. The house was entered by a number of police, and others well armed, that day. In the kitchen were found lying dead, and fearfully cut about, several bodies. Evidently the fraternity had been carousing, and, when drunk, had quarrelled among themselves, until the disagreement had ended in a free fight all round. Quantities of contraband goods were found stowed away in every room in the house. The pirates, or whatever they were, never came back. The house had an evil reputation. No one would live in it, and no one did, until the wisacres of our Barrack Department hired it for the use of British officers, who are supposed rather to like haunted houses, and who from their well-known pluck think it great fun to be hunting ghosts instead of sleeping the sleep of the just. As the noises never ceased night after night, I was at last compelled to quit this uncanny dwelling and rent another house several streets off.

The Religio-Philosophical Journal, of Chicago, edited by our esteemed friend and correspondent, Colonel J. R. Bundy, is as fearless and as outspoken as ever. It may always be depended on to take a sober, common-sense view of all matters relating to Spiritualism, asking only a fair field and no favour. It has won many friends on both sides of the Atlantic, and by its firm and consistent attitude in the conflict between purity of life and free-love, and between genuine and fraudulent mediums, has made itself a power for good for Spiritualism, especially amongst the outside public. However much they may differ from the special views of the Journal, the American secular Press always has a good word to say as to the singleness and honesty of purpose of its management.

The body oppressed by excesses bears down the mind, and depresses to the earth any portion of the Divine spirit we have been endowed with.—Horace.

BELL RINGING BY SPIRITS.

Invisible bell ringing is, I believe, accepted by Spiritualists as an indication of a spirit's wish to communicate. A fact came under my notice some years ago, of which the story told in to-day's "LIGHT" reminds me. The mother-in-law of a friend of mine, who lived with her, died rather suddenly from an accident at home; a few days after her decease, two of my sisters called to condole. During their visit the servant came in with the usual "Did you ring?" and the almost angry reply, "Go away! you know I did not," so much surprised my sisters, that as soon as the door was shut, they asked the meaning of it, and were told that ever since the recent death, bells, which no one had touched or could have touched, had been ringing in the house (a newly built one, by the way) at all hours, and that the servants knew them to be no summons from living housemates.

In about ten days or a fortnight the disturbance ceased. Shortly after this, while staying at the house of a cousin, my attention was arrested one evening by hearing her say in a low voice to one of her guests for the evening, "How has the bell ringing been this year? as bad as usual?" and the answer was, "Well, perhaps, not quite so bad as formerly."

I expressed curiosity about this, and was told that the house occupied by the last speaker was notoriously haunted to an unpleasant degree, so much so, that on taking it the owner entreated his tenants to keep one particular room locked up; a caution their family was too large to allow; and frightful faces and figures of men and women were seen in it by both parents and children. But the bell ringing was confined to a few days of August, beginning on the sixth, and was sometimes so loud and unpleasant that the next door neighbours, newly arrived, sent in to complain, believing it done for sport.

The house is now demolished to make way for a railroad, and the lady who told me these facts, as well as her husband, is dead, or I would ask leave to give both their name and the locality of the haunted house. The room, which ought to have been shut up, looked evil and extremely old, when I went into it to take off my bonnet and cloak, at a tea drinking, and not then having heard anything about it, I exclaimed, "How like a haunted room this looks." Children occupying it habitually, frequently reported to their mother the "ugly faces of lots of old men and women" they saw in it. Unable to give up its sleeping accommodation, she told me she always joked merrily with them about their visions, but one night, she and her husband occupied it, and both saw what made them resolutely close their eyes there for the future, when candles were put out; what they saw she described to me as almost a crowd of horrible looking people advancing towards the bed. Nothing was known of the antecedents of this old house.

THE ADVANCEMENT OF SCIENCE, AND THE STAGNATION OF RELIGIOUS THOUGHT.

The following letter from our correspondent the Rev. C. Ware, appeared recently in the Devon Evening Express:-

The annual meeting of the British Association for the Advancement of Science affords an ever-recurring reminder of the wonderful progress of the modern mind in scientific knowledge, i.e., in the facts, secrets, and resources of the material universe, and the relation and application of these to the interests and the improvement of our physical existence. Geographical research is constantly bringing to light new facts respecting the topographical characteristics and physical features of different parts of the earth's surface. Geology is constantly increasing our knowledge of that wonderful Bible, the earth's crust; and of the Divine revelations which time and nature, during millions of years, have been inscribing upon its pages—its strata and its rocks. The volume of ancient writings which we all have on our shelf is valuable, because it is a product of the human mind—the expression of an infinitely varied human thought; a record of the thoughts, actions, transactions, and experiences of intelligent beings, belonging to this and other worlds. But the contents of that volume are as the crude thoughts of infancy, and the story books of the nursery, when compared to that wonderful Book of God—the Universe, which is under and over, without, within, and around us. Astronomy gives us glimpses of the infinite universe of worlds, to which our tiny earth is related, as a grain of sand is to the wide expanse of the sea shore, or the drops of briny water to the mighty ocean; and the magic art of chemistry is showing how fearfully and wonderfully made, in essence and in combination, are our physical organisation and our material dwelling-place. The Times says of the British Association:—"Each annual meeting brings home the realities of science, the fascinations with which it enthalls its followers, and the gladness of its discoveries to some locality in which these things had, it may be previously, received an indolent assent, but in which they were not held as articles of a real and living faith." God speed the scientific plough!

But, side by side with this grand onward march of material discovery and enlightenment is it not strange, anomalous, and marvellous that there is absolutely no progress, but utter stagnation, in religious thought and spiritual knowledge—I mean within the multitudinous sections of that vast and costly system known as the Church; which is expressly instituted and endowed to teach and promote knowledge concerning things spiritual. In relation to spiritual things, the "Church" is now where the "world" was before Galileo discovered that "the earth moves" as a mere speck in the infinite universe of worlds and systems; where intellectual philosophy was before Lord Bacon taught the human mind to cease revolving eternally upon itself, and to exercise its powers of investigation and induction upon external nature; where astronomical speculation was until Sir Isaac Newton discovered the grand principle of gravity, which infallibly determined the positions and movements of all material atoms and worlds; and where the will-o'-the-wisp flickerings of a vague alchemy were before our great modern chemists, Huxley, Tyndall, Roscoe, Stewart, &c., gave the world an insight into the subtle essences and wonderful combinations of nature's elements and forces. It is a fact, a melancholy fact, that with all this advancement in physical science and material experience, we remain hopelessly stationary and entirely stagnant as regards our knowledge and experience of spiritual things.

Ages and ages ago, the Church formulated and stereotyped its creed, and there it still remains. Hundreds of years ago, in the deepest darkness of an ignorant and superstitious time, a crafty and covetous priesthood invented its crude little theological system—its rival god and devil, who were to be eternally playing at battledore and shuttlecock with the souls of mankind, by the agency of this same well-paid priesthood; its nursery-like heaven, where the goody-goody dupes of this priestcraft were to be rewarded with white dresses, and pretty flowers, and nice sweetmeats; its dark and awful hell of fire and endless torments; its artfully conceived system of sacrifice and blood, and all meritorious faith, as a substitute for good works and righteous living. And, strange to say, there it stands to-day, in this enlightened age; the entire ecclesiastical system being eternally pledged thereto; no advance, no progress; no new thought, fact, or principle; always stationary—nothing but stagnation!

But, sir, I will not dwell upon this picture. I will only say that, thank God, beyond this standing memorial of the dark ages, light—the light of a true spiritual science, of true spiritual knowledge, has dawned upon the minds of millions. To them, the old theological caricature is no more—it has vanished, as darkness vanishes before the morning dawn. The grand principles of spiritual existence are discovered, by the demonstration around us of the intelligent realities of spirit life; the inner realm of being, the inseparable connection between this life and all the spheres of existence beyond it, the essential interblending and intercommunication between the seen and the unseen, and the personal responsibility of life and conduct—effects springing from causes as fruits from the tree, as is illustrated throughout the entire realm of nature.

Earnestly hoping, sir, that this glorious light may dawn upon every mind, and these spiritual realities come to every human being—scattering their doubts and misgivings, and making the life of their spirit buoyant, joyous and free.

I remain, yours respectfully,

CHARLES WARE.

WHAT OUR CONTEMPORARIES SAY.

Weakness of the Spiritualist Rostrum—Remedy.

Complaint, says the Religio-Philosophical Journal, abounds in all quarters of the Spiritualist field, of the paucity of new thought, of hard thinking, of perspicuous, well digested discourses on the part of lecturers. While it cannot be denied that these defects exist, those uttering them do not seem to understand the cause. They fail to see that the lack of compensation is one of the prime causes for the lack of educated teachers. . . . Spiritualism, in its present unorganised, ill defined, chaotic state, offers no inducement to educated teachers, and no person of average business capacity, with a dependent family, can afford to enter the lecture field. As a consequence, with rare exceptions, the Spiritualist rostrum gets its recruits from mediocrity, and this in the face of the fact that Spiritualism offers a solid foundation of incontrovertible facts on which to build the grandest spiritual philosophy the world has ever known; a field which should attract the best talent, the profoundest learning, the most brilliant genius. . . . Now is the opportunity for Spiritualists; let them unite in organised co-operative efforts, upon a platform affording complete intellectual freedom, yet maintaining the highest standard of character. Let the Spiritualist forces be mobilised, drilled and disciplined. Let there be legalised societies, officered by men and women of probity and business tact, who have no selfish ends to subserve in their work for Spiritualism.

Divisions Among Spiritualists.

The Banner of Light marvels that in the very midst of this new descent of influences from heaven, there should be found the slightest divisions of sympathy or sentiment among those who claim to have been the recipients of the larger knowledge and belief. It would better be supposed that the agreement among them would be closer than was ever before witnessed in a multitude of believers who had come into the possession of new forms of truth. That there should be any serious question over facts among believing Spiritualists appears almost incredible; it is to be expected as between Spiritualists and those who professionally traduce them. It is solely upon these same facts, conveyed to the senses through the phenomena, that the whole structure rests. Take these away, and we all return to vagrant speculation and blind faith again. Instead of disputing over the phenomena, it strikes us that it would be much better to give them still closer attention, that their true meaning might be more clearly made known to us and what is valueless might be swept away. If we all receive the phenomena, those signs by which spirit-communications first become known, and then make a study of them, we shall sooner know whether they are worthless than by standing and disputing over them.

The Himalayan Brothers.

Mr. W. H. Harrison, late editor of the Spiritualist newspaper, writing in the Medium of the 5th inst., criticises the difficulties in the way of belief in the existence of the alleged brothers. One or two remarks are very pertinent, and we quote them here with as representing what is thought in some quarters of the pretensions made by Theosophists with regard to Colonel Olcott and Madame Blavatsky:—"All along I have held that the powers about Madame Blavatsky are but the usual 'John' and 'Katie Kings,' whoever they may be, and that she and her friends believe what these unseen intelligences assert as to their identity. I did not know at previous times of writing that when she was in America one of her regular attendant sprites then actually gave his name as 'John King.' Now that Koot Hoomi is on the scene, has the humbler John King of former days disappeared? Has the principle of resurrection believed in by the Australian savage obtained, namely, 'Tumble down black man, tumble up white man.' If so, the case is on a parallel with one which occurred in England with a medium, in which a long-known attendant spirit went away ostensibly to be replaced by another, but some of the oldest observers believed the alleged change to be all nonsense, and that variation had taken place only in the name given. . . . He himself (Colonel Olcott) seems to have originated the hypothesis that she (Madame Blavatsky) had been admitted behind some mystic veil; she on the other hand, at that time was 'very reticent' on the point. Anyone who knows how quickly the intelligences about physical mediums adopt ideas and even names for themselves suggested by the sitters, can see what the result would be if similar ideas about a mystic brotherhood were frequently broached by sitters in the presence of any physical medium. . . .

Criticisms expressing disbelief in the Himalayan Brothers have been ascribed to malice. I cannot see why unfounded stigmas of this kind should be flung at those who cannot accept in faith most of the assertions made by the powers controlling physical mediums as to their personal identity. The question of spirit identity is the most difficult one in Spiritualism, especially to those best acquainted with the subject. . . . In London some physical mediums believe in the asserted identity of their spirits, others do not, but they do not get out of temper or take personal offence at a discussion of the problem. Neither does Madame Blavatsky: so far as I know she has taken my critical examination of the question with the utmost good temper, and there is no reason why anyone should suppress his opinion if he cannot find a scrap of good evidence that Madame Blavatsky is anything but a physical medium acquainted with Buddhist theology, and possessing powers closely resembling those of Mrs. Guppy-Volekman, with such variations as might be expected from difference of personality. . . . This leads up to another point, and to a question I have more than once put publicly and cannot get answered. Theosophists who wish to come into communication with the Himalayan Brothers, and to enter their fraternity, are told they must live the life of severe ascetics, abstaining from wine, spirits, meat, and tobacco, that they must purify their thoughts, and so on, but after many years of such life, it is not guaranteed they will obtain their desire. How, then, is it that Madame Blavatsky, who is not an ascetic, has been successful where those who carry out the instructions she does not follow, may fail? I have never met a strong physical medium who was an ascetic; indeed, the reverse of that characteristic prevails with them, and asceticism would probably reduce their mediumship to zero instead of strengthening their powers."

AN INTERESTING EXPERIMENT.

I have residing with me the step-niece of my wife, who is a good medium for table messages. On Sunday evening, September 30th, it occurred to me that possibly if she were put into the mesmeric sleep her spirit friends might control her; so I asked the question through the table, "If I mesmerise A—e can you control her and speak?" "Yes." "Are you sure?" "Yes." I immediately mesmerised her and in about 20 minutes she began to manifest signs of an influence at work other than my own. By-and-by she said, "There are two here who want to come." She afterwards began to shew symptoms of acute pains in the head, and after they had apparently subsided she began to make signs for writing materials.

I placed a pencil in her hand, and a piece of paper on the table, on which she wrote:—"I can't speak to-night. It is the first time I have controlled. I died of a stroke.—J. H." The following questions were asked by me, and answered through the table:—"Are you the medium's uncle?" "No." "Grand father?" "No." "Any relation?" "No." The table then knocked the name in full. "J. H.—r H—x. I made my will altogether wrong." I may here state the spirit controlling proved to be the half-cousin of the medium's mother, and under whose will the medium is interested.

Last night, thinking to repeat the experiment, I asked the question as on the former Sunday. "Shall I mesmerise A—e that you may control her?" and we got the emphatic answer, "No." "Is it not advisable," I asked; and the answer was still more emphatic, "No." "Then shall we sit?" "Yes." Having sat for a short time, the medium began to be distressed by a deep, dry cough, of an asthmatical character, and to experience the most excruciating pains in the region of the stomach, so much so, that she left her seat and lay down in writhing agony on the floor. Presently I raised her and placed her in a rocking chair, where gradually the pains began to subside, and she in a while began to speak.

I took down word for word all that she said, which was a communication from her own mother to her father, who does not believe in the return of and communication by spirits. It was of a private nature, and, therefore, I do not give it. This I may say, those who do wrong under the impression that no one sees them labour under a great mistake, and when all people have realised this we may expect an improvement in morals.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M. A. (Oxon.)"

I have come across a curious little pamphlet, called "Personal Recollections of the Little Tew Ghost." It is published by a Methodist preacher, named Edgar Hewlett, of Wigan. The events recorded took place in 1838-9, and are therefore antecedent to what is properly described as the epoch of modern Spiritualism. The writer speaks of Spiritualism with the utmost contempt and aversion, and warns his readers "to avoid it as they would a pestilence." He considers it a Satanic delusion, fatal alike to worldly prosperity and to spiritual health. It must indeed be destructive if the writer's statements are to be accepted. For he says, "I had in my hand a few days since a list of the names of about twenty persons who had indulged in this sin, and I am sorry to say that the whole number are now either in madhouses or in premature graves." The dose must have taken most rapid and disastrous effect.

The narrative is a striking one, and, making all allowance for exaggeration and want of familiarity with the subject, it contains nothing that transcends belief. It seems that at Little Tew, a village in Oxfordshire, there resided in 1838, a young woman about twenty, named Hannah, highly respectable and respected among her neighbours. An old fortune-teller came one day and wanted to tell her fortune, but she rebuked the woman and sent her away angry; not, however, before she had predicted that Hannah would marry a man, whom she described, within three months. When the old hag was gone Hannah saw, or fancied she saw, "an eft or asker" on her gown; and from that moment we are to gather that she was possessed. She did marry as had been predicted, and, when Mr. Hewlett first saw her, was the mother of an infant child. She seemed to be suffering both in mind and body, and was persecuted by "uneasily sounds proceeding from various parts of the house, which greatly terrified her and threw her into violent fits."

The sounds varied: scratchings, moanings, shrill whistlings were among the earliest. Then objects were thrown about and broken. Her dress was pulled; glasses and cups were dashed from her hand, and her wedding ring was repeatedly removed and hidden. The fame of all this got abroad, and the neighbours had their own explanation. It was believed "to be some trick of Hannah's," and, among others, "a strong, hearty widow woman, who kept a public-house," went to find it out. She examined the house, and "went upstairs alone for that purpose: but how great was her surprise (!) when she was lifted from the floor to the ceiling and again replaced upon her feet." It must be admitted that investigation becomes difficult as well as dangerous under such conditions, and the hearty widow seems to have "instantly returned home, and was confined to her bed for several days." Mr. Hewlett quaintly adds, "She went no more to the cottage, so that I presume she was fully satisfied." The familiar spirit now added to its annoyances a power of speech. It became most abusive and even foul in its utterances, so that poor Hannah's life was a veritable burden to her. On one occasion Mr. Hewlett went to the cottage just after "the thing," as she called it, "had tried to kill her by throwing a saucepan at her."

He describes his own experience of the voice thus: "I sat down and endeavoured to direct her to the Strong for strength; assuring her if she put her trust in the Lord no power of darkness could harm her. . . . Presently a faint murmuring sound was heard. A death-like stillness prevailed for a few moments, and then the sound was heard again, as though it proceeded from the breast of the chimney over the fire-place. Again all was silent . . . and again the indescribable sound was heard. 'There it is again, did you not hear it, sir?' I said, 'Yes, it sounds strangely.' Instantly a loud sepulchral voice (which in depth of tone resembled the deepest notes of an organ) shouted, 'You're a fool. You're a fool!' The unearthly voice was exactly in front of me . . . I could have placed my finger on the very spot whence the voice issued; it was so awfully distinct."

How the good minister exorcised the foul fiend (as he thought it to be), and how it got itself out and away, I need not tell. He speaks throughout with the firmness of assured conviction of the truth of what he is saying. He has "many witnesses living in Little Tew and its neighbourhood, who are fully acquainted with the particulars, and who would readily confirm the narrative." He says of himself: "Those who know me best do not consider me credulous or superstitious: and it was not till irresistible evidence was afforded, and testimony of persons given whose characters could not be impeached, that I came to the conclusion that beyond a doubt there was an evil spirit in the cottage at Little Tew." If he had known more of the subject which was being illustrated before his eyes he might have varied his conclusion into, "Beyond a doubt there is a powerful physical medium in the cottage at Little Tew." The case is a clear one, and probably has been a little embellished to fit it into the popular idea that the poor girl was bewitched by the gipsy, and relieved by the exorcism of the minister.

I am indebted to Mr. A. J. Smart, who writes from 84, Russell-street, Melbourne, for some striking testimony confirmatory of Mr. Rees Lewis' evidence respecting materialisation phenomena. I have more than once remarked on the value of the evidence obtained at the Cardiff circle: and Mr. Smart fully corroborates what I have heard from other sources. When I come, in due course, to deal with the evidence for the materialisation of the full form I shall avail myself of this testimony, for which, in the meantime,

I return my thanks. The results obtained seem to have been largely attributable to the care exercised in preserving the circle from undue change, in keeping perfect harmony, and in strict attention to the physical health of all its members as well as of the medium. Plain living, purity and cleanliness of body, mind, and spirit too, seem to have opened an adit to the very sanctum into which none can intrude unbidden: and into which, apparently, the most consuming zeal, and the strongest desire for knowledge, are not of themselves a passport. How often is it found that simplicity of faith and sincerity of purpose, a prayerful spirit, and a pure life do avail where more conspicuous fitness, as we should deem it, is for a long time or even perpetually unsuccessful. "Wisdom is justified of her children," but it is in a quite different way.

In the current number of the Spiritual Record are contained some extracts from the Plainsdealer, a monthly periodical published in America by Dr. Nichols thirty years ago. The account of the manifestations then witnessed, and the testimony to their reality, are well worth republishing. Some of the records of the phenomena witnessed at Koon's circle in Athens County, U.S.A., are very remarkable, and belong to an order of things now almost extinct. It was at that circle, I believe, that "John King" first appeared, with a tribe of 168 alleged pre-Adamite spirits. First he was "King" or Chief of this band. The "John" seems to have been an afterthought. The name once given has never died out, and now we have John Kings everywhere. I remember once trying hard to find out whether an American John King who had sent me a message—I think it was through Madame Blavatsky—was identical with the John King who then appeared at Mr. Williams' circle. I satisfied myself that he was not, and did not possess knowledge of what his namesake had told me; neither was he able to gather the information from my mind. It is pretty certain, among much that is by no means sure, that King at first was a descriptive name, and that the Christian name was an afterthought.

The same number contains further instalments of "Testimony from the Earls of Dunraven." The little volume, printed for private circulation by the present Earl when he was Lord Adare, is so scarce that it would be a real benefit if his lordship would consent to its publication either in its present form or with annotations.

A very remarkable account of direct spirit drawings by Dr. Nichols, with some illustrations that imperfectly reproduce the originals, is to be found in the same number; together with a number of Editorial Notes that are very readable. The Spiritual Record will do a service to Spiritualism if its editor will continue to put before the present-day public the inaccessible facts of those early days with which he is acquainted.

SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH.—An "Occasional Meeting" will be held at 4 p.m. on Wednesday, October the 31st, in the rooms at 14, Dean's-yard, Westminster, S.W., for the purpose of informal discussion and conversation on any matters connected with the Society's Researches. The Meeting is open to members and associates, who are at liberty to introduce one friend each. A considerable portion of the evidence collected by the Literary Committee has now been placed in the rooms, for inspection and comment.

Whatever change may come (and I believe a vast and most solemn change is at our doors), it cannot be in the shape of a severance from the spirit of the past.—Frances Power Cobbe. Dawning Light.

THE PHANTOM DANCERS

IN A HAUNTED HOUSE IN HATTON GARDEN.

Extracts from Mrs. Hardinge Britten's forthcoming work
"NINETEENTH CENTURY MIRACLES."

As a final example of hauntings, especially of that kind which subsequently connected itself with the intelligence manifested at spirit circles, we shall cite a history furnished to the author some years ago by a party of her personal friends, amongst whom was a gentleman of probity and scientific acumen, well remembered amongst dramatic writers and musicians, as Mr. Lenox Horne. This gentleman, being in somewhat embarrassed circumstances about the year 1820, took up his abode temporarily in apartments offered to him at a very moderate rent in an old house near Hatton Garden, long since pulled down. At the period of which we write the house was large, the rooms spacious, especially one, supposed to have been a banquetting chamber, which Mr. Horne used as a music-room. As all the lower chambers were either appropriated to the storing of goods, or rented to legal gentlemen as offices, there were no persons sleeping in the house except Mr. Horne, and a porter who occupied a small room on the ground floor. The building had long borne the reputation of being haunted; it was fast falling to decay, and the former occupants of Mr. Horne's chambers were seldom known to remain long within the gloomy precincts. Report alleged that the place had once been the residence of Sir Christopher Hatton, and the weird reputation that attached to the antique domicile, connected itself with the magical practices attributed to his unfortunate lady.

Mr. Horne had tenanted these apartments some months before he was aware of the phenomena occurring within his own premises. At length he was apprised by Mr. March, a police officer with whom he was acquainted, that for several consecutive nights he and a number of persons invited to share his watch, had remarked that long after the hour when Mr. Horne was accustomed to retire to rest, the great banquetting room, which he had no means of lighting up, and therefore never entered except in daylight, could be seen from the court below brilliantly illuminated. Whilst acknowledging that he had often been disturbed by strange noises, odd music, loud laughter, and footsteps, for which he could not account, Mr. Horne—at once the most fearless and least superstitious of beings—strenuously combated the idea of the lights, and it was only when, after watching several nights with March and his associates, he himself beheld every window of his own apartment, one that he had left closed, locked, and in total darkness, lit up as if by a multitude of gas jets, that he could be brought to believe in the story his friends narrated to him. On several succeeding occasions the same party beheld this spectacle repeated, and whilst some of their number remained below to watch that no intruder passed out from the one entrance of the house, the others would hasten to examine the apartment, to find it enveloped in thick darkness. One of the curious features of this appearance was the invariability with which the lights disappeared from the eyes of the watchers below at the moment when the apartment was opened by the searchers above. Only on one occasion was this rule reversed, and that was on a certain night in February, when a larger number of persons than usual had assembled in the court below to watch for the phantom lights.

They blazed out suddenly and in full radiance about one o'clock in the morning, when, after observing them for some five minutes, Mr. Horne, Mr. March, and a nobleman whose name we are not at liberty to mention, determined to ascend the stairs and open the door of the haunted room; and as they did so they agreed to give the signal of a whistle to those in the court below. At the moment when Mr. Horne threw open the large door of the room in question, he and his companions were thunderstruck to perceive that it was full of company.

One of the three observers had given the signal agreed upon of the whistle which he held in his hand, as he gazed upon the extraordinary scene that met the eye. The vast company seemed to be in the act of dancing. They represented ladies and gentlemen, arrayed not in the Elizabethan style attributed to the Hatton period of the mansion, but in the costume of the reign of Charles the Second, and the whole air seemed to be full of waving plumes, fluttering ribbons, and sparkling jewels. The three witnesses, who subsequently compared notes with each other, and found their own observations fully corroborated by those of the others, affirmed that the particulars of the whole scene as above related were plainly, clearly defined, in addition to which, all three declared that every one of these splendidly attired revellers wore, or appeared to wear, a mask, resembling some disgusting animal.

Before the astounded witnesses could sufficiently collect their senses to take any action on what they saw, the lights began to pale and shimmer, the whole scene quivered, melted out slowly and gradually, as in a dissolving view, and at length, that is, in the space of a few minutes, the apartment was seemingly empty and in total darkness. The watchers below reported to those above, when at last they had sufficiently collected themselves to descend, that the lights were stationary for about five minutes after the whistle sounded, and disappeared more gradually than usual.

Immediately after this vision, the house became wholly uninhabitable even to Mr. Horne, and the two friends who volunteered to share his quarters with him.

Heavy poundings were often heard during the day, for which no account could be given. But these were nothing to the Saturnalia which ensued as soon as darkness had set in. Tramping of feet, clashing of arms, the clinking of glasses, the crash of broken china; all the sounds attending drunken revels, rude brawls, and even murderous fights, were heard, at times with horrible distinctness. Low moans, wails, and bitter sobs, were still more frequent, and the rushing as of blasts of winds, from unknown sources, was a frequent feature of these frightful disturbances.

The witnesses, and they were many, represented their experiences to their friends only to encounter the usual sneer of incredulity and scornful derision. Two or three clergymen volunteered to offer prayers, and one zealous Catholic went through the formulse of exorcism in the possessed mansion; but always to encounter such a storm of blows, laughter and hideously derisive sounds, as drove them in horror from the place, a retreat in which they were shortly imitated by the tenants, who never after recurred to their painful experiences without a feeling of deep awe, solemnity, and an earnest entreaty that their narration should not be met with the ordinary methods of rude denial, and insulting jest.

Despite what he had already witnessed, Mr. Horne had no knowledge of, or belief in, the reputed modern Spiritual manifestations, the spread of which, since the year 1848, he had noticed but never investigated.

About the year 1853, being invited to spend the evening with some musical friends residing in Holloway, London, Mr. Horne was there introduced to Madame Albert, a French lady, who was accompanied by her little daughter, a child of some eleven years of age. During the evening the hostess proposed that they should try the experiment of "table turning," which was at that time, the technical expression used for evoking Spiritual manifestations. Madame Albert had, it seemed, developed or mediumistic powers, whilst little "Josephine" was reported to be a fine somnambulist or trance medium. When the séance was first proposed, Mr. Horne laughingly alleged his entire ignorance of the subject, but at once placed himself in position at the table under the direction of the attendant Sybils, "to see what would come of it." No sooner were the party seated, than Madlle. Josephine, seizing the pencil and paper which had been placed on the table, wrote in an incredibly short space of time, in a large bold hand, the following communication, addressed "To M. Lenox Horne," a name which the child up to that moment had never heard. The writing was given in English, a language, it must be remembered, of which the little medium was entirely ignorant.

"You say you know nothing of spiritual existence or the soul's power to return to earth. Oh, my friend! Why will you reject the light that has already dawned upon you? In your own house, you have heard the sounds, and seen the sights, which bore witness to the presence of human spirits. Have you forgotten the phantom dancers, whom you and your companions thought were animal masks? Those dancers were my companions in vice and wickedness. They and I lived amidst scenes of revelry too shameful to be detailed. We were associates of the frivolous rout that occupied the throne of England,—Charles the Second,—and in the house where you found shelter, we often used to hold such revels as demons alone could take pleasure in. When we became spirits, the base passions with which our lives on earth were animated, became so engraved upon our spirits, that all who looked upon us from a higher plane, beheld us transfigured into the semblance of the animals whose natures we partook of. Shocking as this disclosure of our true natures may be, it haply may help future generations to account for the idea of the doctrine of the transmigration of souls. Unhappily, that doctrine is not true. We might be happier as the animals whose limited instincts we represent, but oh, unhappy that we are! we are at once the human beings we ever were, with the additional humiliation of knowing that we take to others the semblance of the lower creatures, whose passions we have imitated. Friend Horne! Our hell is, not to pass into other states, but to live in our own, and by the knowledge of what we have made ourselves, to grow into higher conditions. You thought we wore masks. Alas! We had only dropped them, and exchanged the mask of seeming for the face of reality. In the spirit world, all its inhabitants are known for what they are, and the soul's loves take the shape of angelic beauty, or brutish ugliness, according to the tendencies of the life within. On the night when you beheld our revels, we were obliged, by the law of our being, to go through the earthly scenes which we had taken too much delight in. On earth such revels were our heaven; in the spheres they are our hell. Their enforced enactment was part of our penance; but thank God! I have seen the errors of the past, and henceforward I am atoning for it, and living my wasted life over again. I am on the road of progress, and even this humiliating confession will help me forward, and aid me to become stronger to save others and myself from the vices, the memories of which still cling to me like a garment. Farewell! My earthly mission is done: there will be no more haunting spirits in the old house in Hatton Garden."

The signature to this singular communication was, "One who was known in the day and time of Charles Stuart as the finest woman of her age—Lady Castlemaine."

Appended to Mr. Horne's manuscript, entrusted to the author some years ago with a view of publication, were the following words:—

"Great Heaven! If this be indeed a true picture of the life hereafter, should it not make us afraid of doing wrong? But, above all, what a wicked and soul-destroying delusion has been the clerical farce of salvation by a vicarious atonement!—L. H."

In closing this curious narrative it may not be amiss to give a few extracts from the records of a spirit circle which was held not long since, in which some parties present were commenting severely on the "unmeaning character of such manifestations as bell-ringing and knocking." At this juncture one of the communicating spirits interrupted the conversation with the following pertinent questions:—

"Spirit—Pray, sir, what do you do when you want to enter a house and find the door closed?"

"Mortal—Well! If we really want to get in we knock and ring."

"Spirit—Then don't you suppose it probable that those who have been knocking and ringing in your houses for the past half century are trying to get in too?"

"Mortal—Why, what can spirits want to get into our houses for? Having left the earth, it seems strange that they should want to get back to it again."

"Spirit—Most of those who knock and ring in your houses have never left the earth, and would far rather get away from it than remain in it. But higher and wiser spirits wish to call the world's attention to the actual facts of spiritual existence, and the real conditions under which life beyond the grave is continued. Spirits of a very ethereal nature cannot affect material substances, and yet, in order to call the world's attention, and waken humanity up to what they have to say, they use the methods so familiar to yourselves—they knock and ring; and those who cannot do this for themselves influence the earth-bound spirits, who are magnetically chained to the scenes of their earthly misdeeds, to do this for them."

"Mortal—May we regard these hauntings, then, as transpiring under the direction of superintending spiritual wisdom?"

"Spirit—Everything in the universe outworks the conditions of the being that belong to its state, and providential wisdom avails itself of different states to convert evil into good, and evolve uses out of the worst of abuses. Ten thousand preachers on the human plane of existence could not demonstrate the fact of spiritual existence so conclusively as a spirit who rings a bell in response to a human voice, or answers a question by knocks, when no mortal is near to produce the sounds heard." Verbum sap.

A PHANTASM OF THE LIVING KNOCKS AT THE DOOR.

Towards the end of September, I was visiting a mediumistic friend, Mrs. T., whose husband goes daily to his business in Birmingham, twenty miles off. One Saturday, a fortnight previous to my visit, and a minute or two before her husband was due from the station, Mrs. T. was standing at her bedroom window, which looks out upon the road, when she saw her husband open the garden gate and come up the path. She noticed several parcels that he was carrying and wondered what they were. She was running down stairs to open the door when her brother-in-law called to her and she turned back to speak to him. She told him that she had just seen her husband coming in at the garden gate with some parcels. While they were talking together she heard her husband knock at the front door, and it sounded so plain she concluded that her brother-in-law must have heard it also, but he did not. The maid, however, in the kitchen adjoining the hall heard the knock, which she thought was her master's, and was crossing the hall, when she was anticipated by Mrs. T., who reached the door before her. She opened the door, and finding no one there, ran round to see whether her husband had gone to the dining-room window on the other side of the house. She also sent the maid to the side door in the yard. As she was returning from her fruitless search, the maid called to her saying that Mr. T. was just coming in through the front gate. She went to meet him and asked him at once why he had come in and gone out again. He said he had done nothing of the kind, but had that moment come straight from the station. She said, "Why I heard you knock at the door, and saw you coming in with two parcels in your arms." He was much startled, as she said it exactly as if she were quite certain he had been playing her a trick. He was in fact carrying the parcels just as she had seen them in the vision. The brother-in-law was looking on out of his window, and heard the maid say, that at the same time that Mrs. T. had seen her husband, she herself heard his usual knock. I have also her positive assertion to the same effect, and it is confirmed by the fact of her coming out to open the door. Thus it is certain that the knock was so far objective as to be heard by two people in different parts of the house, who were not at the moment in communication with each other.

I had the foregoing account from the persons concerned, only a fortnight after the occurrence, and have a written memorandum of their recollections from them all.

It would seem that on a previous occasion also, Mr. T.'s spiritual form had anticipated his actual arrival, and given sensible proof of his presence in the house, though he was not actually seen by anyone. There are two trains by which Mr. T. could return to dinner, coming in at 5.30 and 6.30 respectively. On July 12th, he told Mrs. T. he felt sure he could only come by the later train. Accordingly about 5.30 she was in her room putting on her things to go and meet him at the station, when she heard in the room below two or three chords struck on the piano, then the quick run of an octave or two, and then a tune picked out in single notes as if played with one finger. Mr. T. not unfrequently does this, so Mrs. T. concluded at once that he had come in, having got away by the early train after all; and throwing down her hat on the bed, she ran down immediately, to find the drawing-room empty, the piano closed, and no one in the house but herself, the maid being occupied in the washhouse on the other side of the yard. When her husband came in they consulted Planchette, which told them that the notes were physically sounded, and were not merely heard by her in a clairaudient way.

The power of the transcorporeal spirit on certain occasions to produce physical action may be further illustrated by a story I have repeatedly heard from Mrs. De Morgan. She had at one time a clairvoyant little girl under mesmeric treatment, and she would occasionally test her clairvoyant power by directing her to go in the spirit to different places, and observe what was being done there. On one such occasion she desired the little girl to go to the house where she was lodging. "Well," said the girl, "I am come there, —and I have given a rousing knock at the door." The next day when Mrs. De Morgan went to inquire what they had been doing at such an hour, she was told how they had been engaged; "and," said the woman, "some mischievous children came and made a loud knocking at the door, and ran away."

MESMERISM AS A CURATIVE AGENT.

The two following cases of treatment by mesmerism were written at my request by the mesmerist, Henry Stafford Thompson, Esq., of Moorlands, York. He was the intimate friend of Elliotson and Ashburner. The cases have not been published before.

Mr. Henry Stafford Thompson's cures have been so numerous and his benevolence so great, that he is well known in Yorkshire.

C. FITZGERALD.

Moorlands, York,
March 4th, 1876.

I have been so much engaged that I have not been able before this, to comply with your request, and I hope that you will excuse the delay, and now I can only give you a sketch of two or three of the interesting cases that I have met with.

First. The first case is that of a lad named J. Bradley, aged eight or nine years. He was suffering from a diseased knee which for a year had been gradually getting worse. It was enormously swollen, ulcerated, and the leg much contracted. He suffered acute and constant pain, had hectic fever, and cough, and was much emaciated. He had been treated during this time by Dr. Hopps and another surgeon, whose name I forget (both of York). Being interested in the boy, who was the son of one of my labourers, I asked Dr. Simpson, of York, who was then head physician at the York Hospital, to see the boy, and to have a consultation whether it would be advisable to remove the limb, which had been suggested as the only means of relieving him of his suffering. A consultation took place. An operation was decided against as useless, that in his state he could not bear an operation, and constitutionally he seemed so completely diseased. The only thing to be done was to endeavour by opiates to soothe his sufferings, and by nutritious diet and tonics to improve his strength. I was present at the examination, and when the medical man had gone, as the boy was groaning and in great pain, I thought I would try the effect of mesmerising him, as I had frequently in less serious cases been able to relieve from pain. I placed one hand upon his head, and with the other made slow passes down the diseased limb. In a few minutes the boy seemed easy, smiled, said it was very warm, and that he did not feel any pain. I continued this process for more than an hour, as the boy did not go into the mesmeric sleep, but seemed drowsy. I left him. The next morning I saw the boy; his mother thanked me, saying he had slept well all night, and that it was the first night for many weeks that she had been able to get much rest herself, so constantly had she to attend to him; that the boy had never complained of any pain until a short time before I arrived. I mesmerised him, as before, with the same effects (no mesmeric sleep). In a few days the knee was greatly reduced in size, the ulcers healed at the end of a fortnight, the knee, though still enlarged, had become firm, and the boy could bear its being rubbed and pressed upon. I then determined to straighten the limb, and found that after making passes down and over the leg I could use considerable force, pressing on the knee without causing pain. At the end of another week I had got the leg tolerably straight, and the boy could bear his weight upon it. At the end of a month, by moving the leg gently backwards and forwards, he had obtained the power of bending it in some degree. His health had wonderfully improved, all fever and cough had gone, and he could walk about without either crutches or stick, though there was still a rather hard enlarged substance round the knee joints. The boy continued, without any further mesmerising, to improve, grew up to be a strong healthy man, but never acquired the entire free action of the knee joint, though he was able to plough and perform all ordinary farm work. I think that had I persevered longer in moving and pressing on the knee he would have entirely recovered, and the knee been as supple as the other. This I think, judging from other similar cases that I have met with. However, no one who sees him would observe that he is at all lame, and I met him only yesterday riding a young and rather riotous horse. Many years after my first mesmeric experiment upon this lad, he had an attack of typhoid fever, with congestion of the lungs. He was then married, and his wife came to me and requested me to come and see him, as the doctor gave very little hope of his recovery. I went, found him delirious, and his breathing very much oppressed. I placed my hand on his head, making the passes downwards, and particularly over his chest. In an hour he had broken out into a profuse perspiration, his breathing was easy, and the pulse was considerably slower and improved, and he was quite sensible. He went into a deep sleep, slept five hours, and took some nourishment, slept well all night, had no return of any bad symptoms, and was out and at work ten days afterwards. He took no medicine in either of the above cases after I commenced to treat him.

Second case. A great friend of mine, the Rev. E. Wyville, asked me to go and see his sister—she had been bedridden for three years, having been thrown from a carriage, and being a heavy woman and above fifty years of age, she was much shaken, and gradually lost the power of walking or even standing, and at length was unable to sit up for five minutes without being completely exhausted, and in a state of syncope, from which she was with difficulty recovered by the strongest stimulants. She suffered constant and great pain down the spine, particularly at the back of the neck, and this had gradually increased in severity. Her brother informed me that it was the opinion of the medical men who attended her, that she had had concussion of the spine, and that the pain and great prostration were from inflammation or probably ulceration of the spinal cord. He said, of course, he could not expect that mesmerism could be of any real benefit, but as his sister had heard so much of pain being frequently removed by mesmerism, she was anxious to try it. I promised to pay her a visit. As they lived forty miles from my house, I said that I would stay a few days with them, that I might be able to judge whether mesmerism would have any beneficial effect.

I went. On the first day I found Miss Wyville suffering great pain at the back of her neck. In a few minutes, she said that she felt a pleasant warm current of heat going down the spine, and that the pain was leaving her. At the end of a quarter of an hour the pain was gone. I made her sit up, and continued the passes down the spine. She expressed great surprise at not feeling faint or exhausted at the end of ten minutes. She slept well that night, and had little or no return of pain. The next day she sat up for half-an-hour, whilst I made passes with the same good effect, and she appeared to go into a deep sleep. The third day, being free from pain and having had a good night, after being mesmerised, she got up, and found that she could stand up and walk. I left her that day, recommending her to be cautious, and not to attempt too much, and if any pain returned, to let me know. I returned about a week afterwards, found the patient much improved in health and strength, and that she had had a very little pain at short intervals. I continued to pay her weekly visits for some months. She always expressed herself as much invigorated, after being mesmerised. Not having had the power of even standing, for three years, and being a stout and rather heavy person, it was some time before she could walk much, without fatigue, but she gradually got that power, and at the end of six or seven months was quite well, and able to take a good deal of exercise. She never had any return of these very serious symptoms, and is alive at this day. I give you these two cases, because I have often heard it asserted that relief from mesmerism is only temporary, whereas in my experience I have generally found that the relief has not only been permanent, but that the constitutions of naturally weak and unhealthy subjects, and particularly the scrofulous, have frequently appeared completely changed, becoming strong and healthy. I could give numerous instances similar to the foregoing.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[It is preferable that correspondents should append their names and addresses to communications. In any case, however, these must be supplied to the Editor as a guarantee of good faith.]

Mrs. Howitt-Watts' New Book.
To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I have just finished reading the work of Mrs. Howitt-Watts containing the memorial sketches of Justus Kerner, and of William Howitt. Such a treasury of facts and of matters of deepest interest I have seldom seen. The memorial of Kerner is enriched with a very full notice of the Seeress of Prevorst, and also of Mesmer. No fairy story ever absorbed me more. The story of Mesmer's canary bird is worth the price of the book. The sketch of William Howitt, though far from being exhaustive, is of greatest interest. I remember calling on Mr. Howitt, I think in 1866; he shewed me one of his automatic drawings recently done. He said they had been anxious about a son in Australia, and this drawing was given him to shew him that the son was prospering. A tea tree was in full flower, and one of the richest and most beautiful floral creations I ever saw. Not long after the drawing came a letter from the son with the pleasing information that he was prospering like an Australian tea tree in blossom. Some time afterwards (the date will be found in this book), Mr. Howitt wrote me that he had been to Hudson's and had got the photograph of a son in the spirit world that he so much desired, and of whom no likeness existed. This letter is one of my most prized autographs. Mr. Howitt was to me always like warm sunshine. I said once that he was like soft fur, and one who knew his fierce mood, added "with a claw in it." But I never saw any of his stone throwings; they were not needed in my case. Mrs. Howitt-Watts has made a wonderful contribution to the literature of Spiritualism, interesting, valuable for facts and truths, and full of life, that falls like a God-spell over the reader. Praise and thanks to Mrs. Howitt-Watts.

MESMERISM BY E. GURNEY AND FRED.
W. H. MYERS.

II. (See page 450.)

Messrs. Gurney and Myers are fully aware of the interdependence of many of the phenomena roughly classed under the generic name of psychical; e.g., the community of sensation observed in mesmeric rapport between the operator and the "subject" clearly has a bearing on the phenomena of thought-transference between persons in a normal condition. They consider the results in this direction are of special interest, not that they by any means consider the two sorts of phenomena as being identical, but because they hope that the two inquiries will throw light on one another. At any rate a priori objections of impossibility to which the facts are exposed is the same in either, and is satisfactorily disposed of by proof of the reality of either.

This Community of Sensation is one of the most widely attested facts of previous observers, and the experiments made by the writers fully confirm the views of the older mesmerists. This was only to be expected, for as they themselves admit, the evidence already on record in support of the facts of mesmerism is overwhelming, and this testimony, moreover, has been collected and tabulated by men of no mean attainments in the walks of science. We do not say that the Psychical Research Society are doing wrong in commencing de novo and to a certain extent ignoring the results arrived at by previous investigators. On the contrary, we think such action was almost a necessity, arising out of the peculiar apathy with which such research was generally regarded by the scientific world. At any rate, our stock of knowledge, unscientific though many may be pleased to regard it, does not render their task more arduous, and in the long run they will have done us good service in return.

Besides the Community of Sensation, another sort of example of the mesmeric rapport may be found in the extraordinarily exalted susceptibility of the "subject" to sensory impressions received from the operator. They remark anent this point.

As long as this merely takes the form of exalted susceptibility to the operator's voice, combined as a rule with deafness to other voices, it no doubt may be and frequently has been explained in the old way, as due to the dominance of a single idea—the possession of the "subject's" mind by the idea of his operator's control making him abnormally wakeful and responsive to any sensible signs that can be recognised as issuing from him, and correspondingly inattentive to all others. Even so, the experiment may be so arranged as to bring out very clearly the abnormal physical state on which it was Mr. Braid's great merit to insist; for if the operator's voice and words be distinguished among a perfect Babel of other voices, the sensorium of the percipient must be at any rate in a most remarkable state, analogous, e.g., to that of a person who should distinguish the flame of a candle held against the sun. But it seems impossible to carry on the "hypnotic" explanation in any way to cases where the sensory impression is not a spoken sentence, but the faintest whisper of a monosyllable. The individuality of voices (at any rate where there is no exceptional peculiarity in the pronunciation of consonants, such as a lisp) depends entirely on timbre and inflexion, which are produced by the vocal chords and by changes in the shape of the pharynx, and which have no place at all in a low whisper. It is easy for anyone to assure himself of this by shutting his eyes and getting a dozen of his acquaintances in turn faintly to whisper such a monosyllable as "Fred" in his hearing; he will find himself totally unable to identify the author of the sound.

They then pass to a stranger phenomenon still, and one which takes us altogether out of the region of exalted sensibility, in the effect produced on the power of response by the unexpressed will of the operator. Their experiments in this direction were very successful. These cases, it will be observed, however conclusive they may appear as to mental influences acting otherwise than through recognised sensory channels, still do not drive us to suppose any special effluence or force as passing from the operator to the "subject."

But, say they:—

Such an effluence is indeed strongly suggested, as we have already seen, by the mode of producing or of putting a stop to the mesmeric state, taken in connection with the exceptional powers in that direction which certain individuals possess; but as far as the resulting phenomena go, it would be a conceivable hypothesis that the trance condition is produced hypnotically, and not as any special effect of one organism on the other, but that, when once produced, a special mental influence can be brought to bear, analogous to ordinary thought-transference, but differing therefrom in the striking fact that only one person is able to exercise it. Even so, the heart of the mystery, the mental rapport, the problem why the one influential person should always be the operator, remains wholly unravelled; since no amount of supposed hypnotic submission to the operator's will could afford a solution to cases (like those just described) where there was nothing to suggest to the "subject" what that will at the particular moment was. But (the italics are our own. Ed. L.) further experiments make it almost impossible to doubt the reality of some sort of special force or virtue, passing from one organism to the other, in the process of mesmerisation; and however vague at present may be our conceptions of the nature of this physical rapport, there is at any rate a satisfaction in being able to point to it as the basis or condition of the mental.

These further experiments are very interesting, but we must refer our readers to the article for full details. Unmistakable evidence, however, of the reality of the physical effluence is afforded by the fact that though only emitted from living bodies it can be made to produce effects which inhere for some minutes to inorganic ones. With this single illustration of the experiments in question we must content ourselves.

An object which has been handled, or over which passes have been made, by a mesmerist, will be recognised and picked out of a number of similar objects by a person who is sensitive to that mesmerist's influence. This phenomenon is no doubt rare, but fortunately it is one which is particularly easy to test. In the following case, for example, the "subject"—a gentleman with whom we have frequently experimented, and whose anxiety for complete tests has always been fully equal to our own—was engaged in conversation by one of our committee in a room on another floor during the time that the process of mesmerising the chosen object was going on. That process consisted merely of passes and occasional light touches, and was most carefully scrutinised throughout. When it was concluded the mesmerist was taken into a third room by another member of the committee, and the "subject" was then introduced into the room where the mesmerised object lay among a number of others. This object had of course been selected by one of ourselves, and its position in relation to the others was generally changed after the mesmerist had left the room and before the subject entered it; but this was a superfluity of precaution, as the two were never for an instant within sight or hearing of one another. In the first experiment a cardboard box, in the second a pocket-book, selected from a group of ten small objects (including, e.g., a lump of wax, a pen-wiper, a paper-knife, &c.), was mesmerised and was successfully picked out by the "subject" after he had held each of the objects for a moment in his hand. We have found it best to avoid using coins and metallic substances, as our results with them, though sometimes startlingly successful, have been uncertain, and also they are so easily warmed, even by very slight contact with the hand, that it is necessary in their case to take special measures for insuring equality of temperature between the objected operated on and the others. After the second trial we eliminated the uncertainty as to results which might arise from the use of a variety of substances, and employed ten small volumes, resembling each other as closely as two pens. Any one of those that we selected having been operated on, the "subject" identified the particular volume four times in succession the instant that he touched it, and again on a fifth occasion after taking up each of the ten in turn. The sense of smell was in no case resorted to; and to avoid all chance of unconscious indications, we were careful that the particular member or members of the committee who had selected the volume, and knew which of the ten it was, should avoid watching this part of the proceedings. In the last trial (as well as in other successful experiments of the same kind) no contact whatever had taken place between the hands of the mesmerist and the book. That the very slight contact which was permitted in the preceding trials could produce such a change of temperature in a cardboard box or the binding of a book as would be sensible to human hands a minute afterwards, seems a violent assumption; but we took the precaution, during the mesmerising process, of ourselves giving a similar amount of handling to some of the nine objects which were not being operated on. The chances against succeeding by accident in seven consecutive trials of this kind are nearly 5,000,000 to one; and the experiment may therefore, we think, be considered a tolerably crucial one. The "subject" described his sensation on taking up the right object as "a kind of mild tingling;" and, according to abundant testimony, water over which mesmeric passes have been made, has been similarly betrayed to the nerves of the tongue. Our own experiments on this latter point have been successful to the extent of giving results against which, on the hypothesis of accidental occurrence, the chances were hundreds to one; but in these matters it is perhaps a justifiable demand that the adverse chances should be reckoned by millions.

Many other points of interest occur—indeed we feel that even in attempting to summarise at all we do the authors injustice. One fact is of such special interest that we cannot afford to ignore it, and with this extract we must conclude.

It is a fact on which Dr. Elliotson, one of the acutest minds that ever applied itself to these subjects, frequently insisted, but which both mesmerists and anti-mesmerists, though for different reasons, have often been tempted to ignore. Briefly it is this: that (with certain exceptions to be hereafter explained) the more startling effects of hypnotism and mesmerism may be matched with occurrences, either closely parallel or absolutely identical, which have occurred spontaneously; while at the same time, the rarity and the pathological character of their spontaneous occurrence are entirely in accordance with that theory of exceptional nervous affection which has been discussed in this article.

What, then, are the main modifications of ordinary waking consciousness, which spontaneous sleep-wakers (to use a term of convenient vagueness) have been observed to present? The rough analysis, which is all that we shall here attempt, shews us that these modifications extend irregularly over one or more of five regions.

Confining ourselves to broad distinctions of external manifestation, we find obvious changes occurring in (1) sensibility to pain; (2) sensory and supersensuous perception; (3) the current of consciousness; (4) memory; and (5) emotional disposition or character. In each of these particulars we are familiar with certain changes induced by states of nutrition, by expectant attention, by narcotics, by disease. But in each case the spontaneous sleep-waking state will be found to carry us on by an unbroken series from changes which are familiar, and in a certain sense explicable, to changes which are altogether baffling and apparently at conflict with recognised law.

Have never sought or seen,
A splendour more than spring-light
On fair trees waving green,
And more than summer's sunshine
On ocean's silver sheen.

Words that shall echo still,
Perchance some unknown mission
May joyously fulfil:
I think I just begin to see
The splendour of God's will."

Let us now turn to the narrative which Mr. Westlake regards as "unparalleled," highly suggestive and curious it will be found unquestionably to be, and a very affecting history as descriptive of a much-enduring and marvellously disciplined spirit; but the facts of a psychical nature recorded will be recognised by the readers of "LIGHT" as not unfamiliar, and can readily be classified.

Mr. Westlake made the acquaintance of Mrs. Croad in the following manner:—He says: "Hearing soon after her arrival in London, that a wonderful person had been brought into the town, who was deaf, dumb, blind and paralysed, yet could tell who came to see her, and what was going on, like many others I thought it incredible; but one day my wife, being asked to go and see her, called, taking one of the children with her. She was induced to repeat the visit, and to her surprise, found that she had barely entered the room when there was a smile of recognition.

Very soon all my children went, and there was no room for doubt as to what we had heard respecting her. Still it was several weeks before I could make up my mind to visit her." What Mr. Westlake ultimately witnessed interested him so deeply that he received her under his roof and became the compiler of the little book from which the following curious facts are gleaned.

Her Early History and the Causes of her Physical Sufferings.

We learn from some pages of an autobiographical sketch that Mrs. Croad was born at Plymouth, November, 1840. The greater portion of her childhood was spent with her grandparents, her father being absent from England on long voyages. At the age of thirteen she had a very serious attack of illness, which would appear to have sown in her constitution the seeds of future ill-health. When not yet nineteen she was married. Of her marriage she says:—"Though but of short duration, and full of suffering and sorrow . . . yet if ever two were in one we were. Together we drank in the words of Holy Writ; together we sang God's praises, and knelt in prayer. . . . My husband's duties took him away from me the greater part of his time, but I went with him some of his shorter voyages."

* From "The Splendour of God's Will," a poem by the late Frances Ridley Havergal, suggested by words written for Miss Havergal by Mrs. Croad on her slate.

Three children were born to this attached couple. Her health was seriously affected. In August, 1861, she had a fall down a flight of steps which injured her back. In the following October, carrying in one arm her baby and leading with the other hand an elder child, again she fell down nine steps. After this she could scarcely move and was seized with epileptic and cataleptic fits which lasted four months, and would even occur as often as forty times in one day. After this misfortune others, still more frightful, supervened. Her little boy died from the effects of falling backwards into a pan of scalding water, and in the following year, 1865, her husband, who was first mate in a vessel sailing from St. John's, Newfoundland, on which a mutiny broke out, in the excitement of putting in irons one of the mutinous crew, burst a blood-vessel near the heart, and dropped down dead. The news of this frightful calamity brought on in the young widow a stroke of paralysis, which lasted three days. "From this time," she says, "I gradually got worse in body, but more resigned in spirit, and more submissive to my Heavenly Father's will." After this first attack of paralysis, her sufferings continued to increase and it was followed, at intervals, by two other strokes. Three months before the death of her husband she had become bed-ridden, and she continued in this condition until the time when the memoir, from which we quote, was written. "Being left in a helpless and somewhat destitute condition, a number of friends, in the end of the year 1867, succeeded in getting her admitted as an out-patient of the British Home for Incurables," from which institution she is still receiving a small pension, £20 a year, which is all she has to depend upon. Whilst her sight continued she managed, whilst sitting in bed, to do fancy work of various kinds; but in 1870 she became totally blind. In the following year she lost her hearing, and in the year 1874 her speech. She retained the partial use of both hands and arms until April, 1879; and whilst she had this use of hands and arms she communicated with her friends; and expressed her thoughts and wishes by writing on slate or paper. Though her hand was too weak to hold the pencil without some support, she would put the end of it in her mouth and guide it. . . . In January, 1880, she lost the use of both her hands and arms. It was feared she would be unable to communicate in any way with her friends; but she signed for slate and pencil, and they being brought, she put the pencil in her mouth, and using her right hand as a pivot, she wrote a few syllables. Since then she has written in this manner with much greater facility.

Her Communication with Spirits of the Dead and the Living.

"She is," says the writer (Mr. J. G. Westlake), "a decided believer in the communion of spirit with spirit, and that physical separation is no bar to kindred spirits holding occasional communications with each other. Mrs. Croad has frequently told me that she has had communications from departed friends, and also from others still living, at times when they have been in peculiar peril. She tells me that at the time she was residing with her grandparents, while her father was at sea, his life was once in great jeopardy from shipwreck, but on each occasion, although hundreds of miles away, she saw what was transpiring, and informed his father and mother; and that when they next heard from him, they found that what she had described to them was circumstantially true. She also says, that soon after they were married she and her husband agreed with each other that the one that died first should communicate the fact, in some intelligible way, to the other; and at the moment when he fell senseless on the deck of the vessel, he appeared in the most unmistakable manner to her, and said, 'Good-bye, Carrie! I am going.' She was so certain that he was dead, that she told her friends what she had seen, and although they did not place much confidence in her statement, they took note of the exact time, and in a few weeks after, when the letter conveying the intelligence of his death arrived, they found that, making allowance for difference of longitude, the time of his death coincided exactly with his appearance to her. She would frequently, when living with us, ask that her room should be put in order, as she expected visitors shortly, and this, possibly, when she had not had any one to see her for some days, nor had any apparent reason to expect that anyone was coming. We found her uniformly correct in her impressions."

Other curious instances are given of her almost continuous condition of the clear-seeing of events; but we must pass on to other manifestations of abnormal phenomena, chiefly, however, ranging themselves under the heads of "Clairvoyance" and "Clair-audience."

Mr. Westlake epitomises them, viz. :—

1. Knowledge of persons and their handwritings.
2. Recognition of pictures and photographs.
3. Description of colours.
4. Recognition of tunes, and the number of persons singing.
5. Detection of family resemblances.
6. Telling the age of persons.
7. Delineation of character.
8. Knowledge of what is taking place beyond her own room.

The mode by which visitors communicate with her is to write upon her face.

"When her letters come by post they are taken up to her; she merely passes them across her cheek and at once knows from whom they come. I remember," writes Mr. Westlake, "taking a letter that I thought she would wish to be read at once, so I waited, thinking she would hand it back to me to open and read. As I did so, I offered my services, but, replied she, 'It's only a printed circular about J—'s holidays.'" . . . "We all know, or think we know, that cartes de visite are quite smooth. There are no raised or depressed parts, as there are on a painting, or even on a pencil or pen and ink sketch, yet she can detect the likeness of her friends in an incredibly short time. About two years since, my wife and a lady friend went to see her; this friend had recently had the likeness of her children taken in a group, and also in separate portraits; these children as well as mine were well known to her. She was first shewn the group. She passed it over her face, and then pointing to one, said, 'That is A.' to another, 'That is E.' to another, 'H.' and of another, whose name she could not remember as she had not seen him so frequently, wrote 'boy.' In every instance she was correct. The friend was then going to hand her the separate portraits, but before she did so my wife slipped a portrait of one of our children among them; she felt the cards as before, in each case giving the correct name, until she came to ours, and then she lifted her hand and shook it in a menacing manner at my wife, which we perfectly understood to mean, 'No tricks on me, if you please; you thought that I should not know, but I do.'

"The day after she was brought into our home, where she stayed, she pointed round the walls, imitated the twitter of birds, and wrote on her slate the colours in the paper—with birds nestling among leaves and flowers. Her description was quite correct." She says: "Colours are known by their degree of heat, smoothness or roughness—white being cold; black, hot or raised; red, very hot and smooth; blue, hot and grating, edging my teeth; brown, very grating; and so on."

This description of her sensations leads to the inference that the clairvoyant perception of Mrs. Croad may probably be a mingling of physical sensation transmitted to the brain by contact with the nervous system, with the occult power and perception usually understood by the psychologist and

WHAT OUR CONTEMPORARIES SAY.

The Ohio Tax upon Mediums.

Criticising the so-called Russell Law passed by the Ohio Legislature at its last session, and of which one clause provides that "astrologers, fortune-tellers, clairvoyants, mediums, seers, &c., shall pay a licence of 300dols. per annum," the Religio-Philosophical Journal says: "This section has given rise to hasty denunciation and ill-considered criticism in some Spiritualist quarters. . . . The Journal in accordance with its invariable custom refrained from taking a sectarian or partisan view of the action of the Ohio Legislature; but proposed before discussing the matter to have the official text of the law, and to know also the object aimed at by those who instigated it. . . . We wrote for a copy of the law and also addressed a letter of inquiry to Hon. E. O. Eshelby, Comptroller of Cincinnati, who we had been informed was the instigator of the Russell Bill. We are assured by some of his fellow citizens, who are Spiritualists, that Mr. Eshelby is a gentleman of broad, liberal views, with nothing of the religious bigot in his nature, and this is indicated by his reply which we give, as follows:—

CINCINNATI, May 29th, 1883.

DEAR SIR,—Your letter of inquiry under date of May 24th, is at hand, and in reply I would say, that there are a number of parties in the city, who have (from the best information obtainable) under the name of mediums, clairvoyants, &c., been engaged in disreputable and immoral practices.

The Russell law is, and was so intended by its framers, to apply to the above parties and to them only, and not to those legitimately engaged in disseminating the doctrine of Spiritualism, or in pursuit of knowledge concerning continuity of life beyond the grave.

To an unprejudiced and impartial observer, it would seem that no person or set of persons are more interested than the true and honest believers in Spiritualism, in suppressing impostors; by so doing they deprive sceptics and unbelievers of potent arguments furnished daily by so-called mediums, &c. . . .

By referring to the title of the law it will be seen to apply only to cities of "the first grade of the first class;" Cincinnati is the only city in Ohio of over 200,000 inhabitants—the number requisite to make a city of the "first grade of the first class" in that State; and the law was thus worded to avoid special legislation, but intended for Cincinnati alone. The Journal's readers have before them the text of the law, Mr. Eshelby's statement of its purpose, and the statements of a trustworthy citizen personally interested in whatever affects mediums, (1) as to the cause of the enactment of the law, and (2) an opinion upon the law and its workings after five months' trial. [Quoted by the R. P., in its issue for September 29th.]

Now, continues the Journal, let our readers, laying aside all bias and prejudice, join us in an attempt to take a comprehensive view of the several questions involved. It is a painful, deplorable fact that under the guise of mediumship, individuals of both sexes in all the large cities of the country and in many smaller places, are engaged in most reprehensible practices, preying upon the frailties of human nature, debauching the weak, robbing the confiding, sowing seeds of domestic dissension, and preying upon all who can be lured into their clutches. Every well informed Spiritualist knows this. Some of these vampires have more or less medial power, and they are far more dangerous than others who have none, for thereby they are the more easily able to gain psychological control of their victims. The advertisements of these wretches afford no small revenue to daily papers, and their practices are frequently aired in police courts, and accounts thereof spread out with startling headlines in the very newspapers that help on the fraud by publishing the advertisements. Honest mediums have under the existing state of affairs no way of separating themselves in public opinion from the quacks and tricksters. The Religio-Philosophical Journal has for years been striving to aid reputable mediums and to render the public exercise of mediumship respectable, by an uncompromising warfare upon all fraudulent mediums, and by endeavouring to teach investigators how to eliminate the multitudinous sources of error. . . . We have for years asserted that unless Spiritualists took the matter in hand and regulated it themselves, it would be attempted by the State Legislatures, composed of members ignorant of Spiritualism and thereby disqualified to act wisely and fairly. Whenever we have hinted at this in the Journal the whole horde of mountebanks, their defenders and dupes, have defiantly cried: "Where and how are you going to draw the lines?" Many good people, while deploring the condition of affairs, have stood helplessly, and in despairing tones, asked: "How is one to discriminate, and how can the line be drawn?" And thus matters have gone along until the very thing we predicted has taken place in Ohio; which will be mesmerist as "Clear-seeing." Numerous other still more extraordinary instances of this abnormally developed faculty are given by Mr. Westlake. Their length, however, prevents their being extracted.

The amount of her consciousness of sound is also very curious, and would appear to be rather a sublimated physical sensation than the clair-audience of the ordinary psychic. She thus expresses herself: "If a drum is being played, the moment it is struck at a distance it affects me, and then others, who suspect what is the matter, go out to listen and cannot hear it; but I have felt it. It is as if I have received a blow on my spine, about half-way up my back, which instantly runs to my brain, finger-ends, and toes, causing a sharp pricking sensation. The nearer it comes, the more painful it is, and the harder and quicker the body beats and quivers. It is not hysterical, as some say, who have seen me, but intense pain and action of the nerves and heart." Music, however, of a more gentle and sweet harmony, especially vocal, has extreme charms for her. In reading the account of this deaf, dumb, and blind lover of music, one is reminded of the line of Keats in his "Ode on a Grecian Urn," when he says, "Heard melodies are sweet but those unheard are sweeter!"

Possibly, in the person of this greatly afflicted being, we have a case in which the sublimated sensations and perceptions of the physical have as yet but partially passed over into the sensations and perceptions of the more purely spiritual body or "nerve-spirit of the German writers: or indeed, perhaps, where the two separate degrees of perception meet and mingle upon a "border-land." Herein, possibly, may lie for the Psychologist, the true interest of the experiences of Mrs. Croad.

As in the case of the "Seeress of Prevorst," of Elizabeth Squirrell, and other "Psychic" of this peculiar nature, verse-making has developed in Mrs. Croad simultaneously with other unfoldings of the occult nature.

Clear-seeing, prophetic gifts, and verse-making, in the days of the Greek Oracles, dwelt together; possibly will ever be discovered, in all ages and nations, linked together in a mystical triune life.

An instance, therefore, of this last-mentioned gift, will not inaptly conclude the sketch of this very remarkable "sensitive."

A lady residing at Swindon, we are told, who is confined to the house the greater part of the year, sent to Mrs. Croad the following lines written by Madame Guyon during her imprisonment:—

"ONE CAGED BIRD TO ANOTHER.

"A little bird am I, shut in from fields and air;
But all day long I sit and sing to Him who placed me there."

To which Mrs. Croad replied the next day with:—

"THE CAGED BIRD'S STRAIN TO ITS MATE.

"Caged are we, and walled about
From every conflict, fear and doubt;
Securely sheltered from the blast,
Held by God's hand so firm and fast.
No bitter winds can on us light,
No scorching sun our lives can blight;
For grace and peace, and love Divine
Here fill our souls and round us shine;
Though thus deprived of free access
To mountain, rill, and vale's recess,
Faith bears the soul on eagle's wing
To pierce the mansion of our King."

It should be mentioned that occasionally she appears to live without taking solid nourishment. During "three weeks," at one time, "she did not take nourishment equal to half-a-pint of milk." Notwithstanding all this suffering "she is exceedingly cheerful, and except when enduring extreme attacks of pain, never utters a complaint."

followed by laws in other States having the same object in view, unless Spiritualists at once take up the matter and regulate it themselves. The subject is, we frankly admit, surrounded with some seemingly perplexing problems, but they are to a great degree more apparent than real.

A Cincinnati man, a representative of the partisan Spiritualists, without making any distinctions between mediums and mediums, exclaims to the Commercial Gazette reporter: "Those mediums are the ministers of our religion. They are what the priest is to the Catholic, and what the Protestant minister is to his brethren." How many intelligent Spiritualists will agree with that assertion? Not one that we know! Here is a sample advertisement taken from a large number, shewing the kind of spiritual adviser Spiritualists are declared to hold in reverence, whose business is too sacred to be interfered with, who is a religious teacher:

MME. — CLAIRVOYANT AND TRANCE

MEDIUM, astonishes all by her wonderful power, revealing every important event that has occurred in the past, or will occur in your future life; has the celebrated Parisian charms, guaranteed infallible; brings the separated together; causes love, marriage and success in every undertaking; consultation personally and by letter.

Here is another:

MME. — TRANCE MEDIUM AND

MAGNETIC Physician, guarantees to her visitors complete satisfaction, revealing their most profound secrets and giving an entire life reading; has the renowned Persian charms for love, business, health, &c.; gives full information in regard to lost or stolen property, describing articles with person having them, with name. Remember, — asks no questions, but tells you all the important events in your life, from cradle to grave. Consultations personally or by letter.

Where is the Spiritualist so rabid or debased as to have the boldness to declare these advertisers are religious teachers; that they shall not pay a tax; that the strong arm of the law shall not aid and detect them in their nefarious vocation? Where is the respectable Spiritualist who will not join hands with Mr. Eshelby and all officers of the law in suppressing such business, to the end that mediums following their legitimate calling may be freed from such company, and the weak and unwary protected?

Here is another specimen of the dignity and high religious character of the class Spiritualists as a body are called upon by outcries from Cincinnati, Boston and Philadelphia, to indiscriminately fight for and protect from paying a licence to ply their vocation, on the grounds that they are "religious teachers" or mediums. In the one case their "religious" privileges must not be abridged and in the other their civil "rites" must not be "outraged" by asking them to divide their spoils with the city which furnishes police force to protect them in their practices:

SPIRITUALISM.—EXTRAORDINARY

MATERIALISING Séances in the light, Sunday, Tuesday and Thursday evenings. Business and medical sittings daily. A positive cure for nervous debility and all chronic diseases.

The individual who prepared the above advertisement and pays hundreds of dollars yearly for its publication, fully agrees with the assertion of the Cincinnati man. Indeed, he has said so under oath, and that settles it. Once upon a time, in an evil hour, and under another name, he was practising his arts on the Pacific Coast, and being arrested for not paying a licence, he swore that he regarded mediums as preachers, priests, clergymen, and that he pursued his calling as a religion. Unfortunately for this deeply religious soul, one of the witnesses for the prosecution swore he had caught the reverend gentleman, the devout clergyman, with a white band tied around his forehead, a white cloth thrown about his neck and shoulders, a sheet hanging from the waistband of his trousers, and crouching in the corner of the cabinet, at the aperture of which there had just before been exhibited a female spirit with a moustache. His lawyer was equal to the occasion, however, and argued that whether his client was a fraud or not, it didn't affect the "religious" phase of the defence. Yet, in spite of all the swearing of the defendant and pleading of his lawyer, this religious teacher was found guilty of violating the ordinance.

Supposing a Methodist minister should publish in a daily paper such an advertisement, for instance, as the following:—

METHODISM.—EXTRAORDINARY EXHIBI-

TIONS of the power of the Holy Ghost and the gates of heaven set ajar. Sunday, Tuesday and Thursday evenings. Business and medical consultations daily. A positive cure for nervous debility, and all chronic diseases. Clarence Shea, D. D., M. D.

About how long would it be before the notice would be copied and commented upon by the Press of the country regardless of politics or religion, and about how long would that minister remain in good standing with his church or evade payment of a licence for the "business" end of his religion, provided a city ordinance covered such cases? Not long. And Spiritualists would be among the first to point out the charlatan and laugh at his discomfiture.

The Ohio legislators agreed with the framers of the Bill, that some Act was needed to draw the lines and establish a standard, a work which Spiritualists should have done, and in their want of knowledge of the subject they, with those presenting the Bill, blundered in framing it. The letter of the law is, therefore, likely to work hardship to honest mediums, and should be changed to meet the spirit in which it was framed, as set forth by Comptroller Eshelby. This can readily be done at the next session of the legislature, and we feel certain that those who instigated its passage will be glad to co-operate with intelligent, fair-minded Spiritualists in framing a suitable amendment. In the meantime no reputable medium in Cincinnati will suffer.

If Spiritualists prefer to remain as at present, a vast, unorganised body, with no platform and no standard; if any person claiming to be a medium must continue to be, regardless of character or reputation, placed on the same level with well-tried and honest mediums, then it must be expected the outside world will step in and take a hand in abating evils which of necessity accompany such a condition of affairs. Let Spiritualists organize upon the platform of the American Spiritualist Association, and all the needed reforms will come about easily, quietly, naturally, with no undue hardship and no injustice to anybody.

METROPOLITAN SPIRITUAL LYCEUM.

CAVENDISH ROOMS, 51 AND 53, MORTIMER STREET, REGENT STREET, LONDON.

We are pleased to be able to shew our sympathy with the work being carried on by this Association by giving publicity to the following circular. There is room for not only one or two, but for half-a-dozen such agencies in the various districts of the Metropolis.

THE METROPOLITAN SPIRITUAL LYCEUM.

The Council of this Society have the satisfaction of informing the Members, and the Public generally, that they have secured a suite of rooms at the address quoted at foot,—the business premises and residence of their permanent Lecturer, Mr. J. J. Morse,—and that their efforts, including a Library of 300 volumes, will be located there on and after Monday, the 15th inst.

From the same date to the end of the month, two or more of the Members of Council will be in attendance every evening to receive their friends, to enrol Members and Associates, and generally to explain to all inquirers the work and purposes of the Society.

Members pay 20s. annually in advance, in one sum or by instalments of not less than 5s., and the resulting privileges are:

Free use of Library and Reading Room.

Right to receive, free of charge, one copy of every publication of the Society, if in paper covers.

Gratuitous admission to elementary circles of inquiry, if individually approved.

Preferential admission to all public meetings and services.

Participation in the management generally, and by election to special offices; with

One vote at all meetings of Members.

Associates are received exclusively for the preliminary investigation of the fact of Spirit Communion, and pay a fee of 5s. for any period not exceeding three months. If then they become Members that sum is applied as on account of the subscription due from them as such; our wish being that, in all cases, elementary circles of inquiry shall be free.

The Council reserve notification of further arrangements, and of special departmental details, until they are themselves assured that every thing is in order in their new home.

In the meantime the undersigned will reply promptly to all written communications, and cordially welcome all visitors.

THE CORRESPONDENCE ON ESOTERIC BUDDHISM.

This week we give the concluding portion of the discussion on this subject, and now, as we have already intimated, it must drop for the present, more particularly as no practical good seems likely to be the outcome of an extended controversy. We are not Theosophists, and may be under some misapprehension as to the standpoint taken by them, when we suggest that, until such ugly facts as that urged by Mr. Henry Kiddle are satisfactorily explained, they cannot reasonably expect serious attention to be given to merely speculative theories. At the same time we are anxious to give a fair field and no favour to all who have something definite to say upon the subjects discussed in this journal, and if at any future time Mr. Sinnett, Madame Blavatsky, or others, are in this position, we shall be very pleased to open our columns to them.

On another page will be found a letter from the above mentioned lady. We print it because Madame Blavatsky and many Theosophists consider the provocation to have been very strong, but for the future we must decline to insert letters the tone and temper of which are so alien from that which we desire to see. It will be well to leave purely personal matters alone. In Madame Blavatsky's opinion "G.W., M.D." may have been too strong in his language, but we cannot but think that Madame Blavatsky herself would have done greater service to the cause which she espouses if her protest had been more temperate in its tone.

The protest from Hindu Theosophists we very willingly give. It will be found in another column and explains itself.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M. A. (Oxon.)"

The authoress of "The Gates Ajar" has given to the world a charming sequel to that very popular little work. "Beyond the Gates" is a book that will be widely read, all the more so that the word Spiritualism is not once mentioned in it, though the whole story is devoted to an exposition of the Spiritualist's faith as to the future life. Some of the experiences of the soul, depicted in every case with perfect naturalness and much graphic power, are true to life, as those whose spiritual eyes have been opened can testify. The moral lessons taught and illustrated are excellently enforced. "Their works do follow them" who have done good. Their "sins find out" those who have done evil. The borderland between this state and the next is crowded with those whose treasure is on earth. And to them, passing to and fro on ceaseless errands of mercy and love, come, from the state of bliss to which they have ascended, the loving spirits who learnt on earth to lend a helping hand to those in need of it, and who find their happiness as ministering angels now. The perfect verisimilitude of the whole narrative is very charming. In this it far exceeds a book that has lately attracted attention—"A Little Pilgrim in the Unseen." The multiplication of such books, and the eager way in which they are read, is a sign of the times.

I am not about to usurp here the province of the Reviewer when I draw attention to an important addition to spiritual literature in the shape of a work by Mrs. Howitt-Watts. The lives of Kerner and Howitt, so far as they were concerned with spiritual matters, and can be fitly called "pioneers of the spiritual reformation," are here sketched by the hand of one who is eminently qualified for the task. Her great sympathy with Kerner has led her to present a charming portrait of that remarkable man. And none even of those most closely associated with William Howitt, in his work as a Spiritualist and Reformer, could do him the same justice in his life-labours as his daughter has done. She has manifest advantage denied to even his closest friends. For she can not only shew us the force and power of that most vigorous mind—its sterling and uncompromising honesty and tenacity of purpose,—its controversial aptitude, its readiness of fence, its vehemence in defence of truth—but she is able also to shew us how, as earth and earthly interests grew dim and the eternal verities grew nearer and more clear to view, the might of the man seemed merged in love, and his whole being became transformed. The life of conflict had at last its fruitage of peace. The man of war, whose blows, struck for the faith that was in him, had been so vehement and so telling, passed to his rest all gentleness and love. No more beautiful picture than that which Mrs. Watts has drawn, and which no other pen but hers could have drawn, is to be found in the range of biographical literature. I count on the gratitude of my readers for transferring to these columns this most touching picture of the transition of a great Spiritualist.

"In January, 1879, chilled through being caught in a sudden shower, bronchitis supervened. By this bronchial attack he was confined to the house for some weeks. His family grew anxious. Still greater became their anxiety when hemorrhage set in, the heart being affected. On the receipt of this sad intelligence, the writer and her husband started immediately for Rome. Happily, we found my father still alive. To us he looked at first but little changed. He was seated in his arm-chair in the dining-room, wrapped in his dark purple dressing-gown, with his venerable snow-white beard falling upon his breast, on his head his small black velvet cap. His face had grown slightly thinner; over his whole countenance was spread a strangely spiritualised and almost transparent look—and he was so very still! He said that he hoped soon to be stronger, and that then we would all go together to Albano and enjoy some days of mountain air; that he should like to show us the lovely flowers which grew there in the spring. Alas! we knew that never in this world would he be stronger, nor go forth again to gather spring-flowers. As yet he was unaware of the fatal nature of the recently developed symptoms. For three weeks he yet remained on earth to those who loved him so tenderly.

"From the commencement of his illness, he appeared to have become merged into the pure realm of love. The vigour, the energy, the fire, the combative strength of that great nature already had passed off like an outer envelope, revealing to the full the innermost nature—the principle of his being—Love.

"He deeply felt the ceaseless ministrations of affection shown him throughout this season of weakness and suffering by friends whose friendship to him was very precious. 'I am ministered to by angels in earthly form!' he said repeatedly, referring to those friends in Rome.

"He bade his wife and children 'to rejoice with him and not to mourn when,' as he expressed it, 'he should have cast off this clod of a body and have passed on to his own generation.' Almost the last words uttered by him were 'blessing upon his family, his friends everywhere, and,' he added with emphatic, though feeble accents, 'upon the whole world.'

"On the Sunday evening of March 2nd he became much weaker. All afternoon he had been seated in his arm-chair near the window. He said he was 'weary,' could he not be removed to his bed? He marvelled at his extreme sense of prostration. 'Except for this heaviness of the body,' he added, 'I feel quite well, and as though I could go anywhere.' Tenderly he was borne by his beloved ones to his bed, from which his emancipated spirit, on the morrow, was to ascend to its Creator.

"After a physically restless, but mentally calm night, it was evident, when morning dawned, that the end was near. He now spoke but rarely, yet appeared constantly to pray inwardly. Evidently in some occult manner he had learned the exact hour appointed for the removal of his spirit. Thus in great weakness did he continue through the forenoon.

"About three o'clock p.m. a friend, the Rev. Dr. Nevin, the clergyman of the American Church, called to inquire how he was; my father, hearing who was come, said he should be pleased to see Dr. Nevin. After the exchange of a few friendly words, Dr. Nevin asked my father if he should offer up a prayer for him. 'Certainly,' was the reply. We all knelt around the bed. The two faithful Italian servants, who were devoted to their dying master, knelt near the door of the room, weeping like children.

"Scarcely had Dr. Nevin retired when, as if the blessed angels had assembled to receive the spirit, now ready to depart with a sudden and startling energy he exclaimed in a strong voice—'Lift up my hands! Lift up my hands!' His wife and daughter, standing one on either side his bed, each held up a hand, already heavy with death, when, somewhat raising himself upon his pillows, as if to grasp the invisible before him, his head sank back, and the spirit had arisen! The aged countenance assumed almost immediately an incredibly youthful, it might be called a beatified, expression—the expression as of one who, having fought the good fight through Divine grace, had gained the victory and entered into his rest."

The life of Kerner is most appropriately inscribed:—

The biography of William Howitt is associated with the name of another pioneer, who still remains with us, "William M. Wilkinson, his friend and co-worker." Mrs. Watts' unwearied labours in the cause she loves have added to the literature of Spiritualism a volume for which our heartiest thanks are due.

The Psychological Press Association has issued a very complete list of works bearing on Spiritualism and kindred subjects. It includes all standard works issued in England and abroad, and numbers over 600 volumes. All profits are devoted to the free distribution of spiritual literature. The books published by the Association are excellently got up. My own "Spirit Teachings," and Mrs. Watts' volume which is just published, are exceptional specimens of printing and binding.

SINGULAR VISION.

Some time ago, when Dr. Percival was headmaster of Clifton College, an excursion by steamer was made by some of the masters and ladies, and boys connected with the college, from Cumberland Basin to Chepstow. The family of one of the masters were of the party, but he himself stayed at home. At seven p.m. he went to the front door of his house and looked out idly for a minute or two. As he did so he saw, or thought he saw, the steamer alongside the quay at Chepstow. One of the boys slipped, fell, and in falling between the steamer and the shore, tore his face. After this curious scene had passed before his eyes he went indoors, and settled down to work in his study. 'About nine o'clock he heard his wife in the entrance-hall, and the scene at the landing-place flashing back upon him, he said (half ashamed of the folly of giving any weight to it), "Well, did you get that boy out of the water?" "Yes, of course, he was only frightened, not hurt, except a ducking. But how on earth do you know anything about it? I am the first to come up, the others are walking." "Never mind how I know. What about the wound on his face?" "Oh, you know, so-and-so (the boy in question) has a hare-lip."

The lady who kindly procured me the foregoing account from the gentleman who had the vision, was at the picnic herself, and saw the boy fall into the water. She remembers that some of the party were afraid he had cut his face, but it was a hare-lip. The accident happened on the arrival of the party at Chepstow, before lunch. What to do with the drenched boy was the difficulty. A friendly old woman, however, took him into her cottage, and put him to bed while his clothes were washed and dried, and there he spent the day.

The remarkable point is the long interval between the accident and the clairvoyant vision at Clifton. I wrote to call the attention of the seer to this singularity, but he assures me that his recollection is clear as to the time of day at which he saw the scene. His impression was that the accident really happened in the evening at the time when the party were preparing to return, but this was plainly a mistake on his part. He would seem to have taken his notion of the boy having torn his face, not from direct clairvoyant sight of the scene itself, but by reflection from the impressions of those who were actually present at it.

DIRECT SPIRIT WRITING.—A correspondent in America reports to Le Spiritisme (Paris) that through the mediumship of Mr. George Cole, of Brooklyn, direct spirit-writing is obtained. A sheet of blank paper was signed, folded several times, enclosed in a box, and placed on the mantel-piece by the investigator. The medium, after ten minutes' waiting, described three spirits as engaged about the box. The description pointed to L. Judd Pardee, Voltaire, and Lucretia Mott, as known by their portraits. When the investigator opened the box, he found his signed paper contained three notes written, bearing the signatures severally of the personages described by the medium, who called attention to the fact that the writing was like his own, except that over the signature of Voltaire, which looked like that of an old person.

"ESOTERIC BUDDHISM."

By the Hon Roden Noel.

After the indignation expressed by Spiritualists (among others by Mr. Farmer, in the Psychological Review) at the publication of my former comments on some theological positions in "LIGHT," as being so much too long and abstruse, and blocking the way for publication of exciting "facts," I ought, perhaps, to have the grace to hold my tongue for ever after! But the perusal of Mr. Sinnett's book has set me off again, and I throw myself on the indulgence of the editor and his readers, craving a little space, as Mr. Tangle claimed time, for the utterance of a "few more words!" Of the ability, value, and interest of Mr. Sinnett's book there can be no question. I for one have to thank him for a lucid, and yet thorough, deliverance on Buddhism, resting on teaching that may certainly be regarded as authoritative upon the subject. My own brief remarks on Buddhism were the result of a desultory, rather than an exhaustive study of the system, and hence I gladly submit to be corrected by himself, Mr. Lillie, and "C. C. M." But, on the other hand, I find that my objections to the substance of theosophic teaching remain very much the same as they were after reading the "Fragments of Occult Truth," and other deliverances in the Theosophical monthly journal. I do not see that I have anything to modify in what I said about the questions at issue in the series of papers, so ably and courteously controverted by "C. C. M." But I should like to put some of my objections in new, and perhaps clearer, words. Into the exalta quarto of whether each man consists of a great number of separable Principles, some of these only, however, being present in some men, and not others, these Principles being also capable of existing apart from one another in such a manner as to simulate, in their isolation, the whole "human combination" popularly known as a person ("Shells")—I shall not again enter, "C. C. M." and myself having already gone into it at more than sufficient length, and the difference between us on the point being evidently an irreconcilable one. The question seems to resolve itself into this—is a man a conglomerate of principles conjoined from without, or is he a spiritual substantial unity, developing his own "principles" from within? Leaving this, however, we come to the question how far the system of doctrine authoritatively expounded in Mr. Sinnett's book may be regarded as Materialism, though one subtler than our crude Materialism of the West. Materialistic I called the teaching of Eastern Theosophy, and for calling it so I was very severely taken to task by "C. C. M." Therefore I am sorry that I must repeat, after reading attentively the further deliverance of Mr. Sinnett, that a subtle form of Materialism it still appears to me.

"Occult science," we are told (p. 22), "is wholly free from the logical error of attributing material results to immaterial causes." Now, considering that Mr. Sinnett and I are constantly engaged in moving our eyes, arms, and legs in obedience to our intelligent wills, this is a logical error, which even occult science must find it very difficult indeed not to make! Without calling in the somewhat clumsy philosophical devices of "Pre-established Harmony" and "Occasionalism," as did Leibnitz, Geulinx, and Malebranche, principles which occult science is not in a position logically to call in, I do not see how we can contradict the intuition of common-sense, that material results certainly are (very often, at least) attributable to immaterial causes.*

The chapter on "Buddha," as regards the special subject of which it treats, is, however, a most instructive and interesting one. I may say that, endeavouring to obtain for myself some insight into the mystery of the incarnation of our Lord Jesus Christ, I had arrived at a conclusion in some respects very similar to the doctrine here enunciated concerning the successive incarnations of the Buddha. It appeared to me that while we are all of us, as far as our present conditioned and "fallen" consciousness is concerned, so to speak, involuntary incarnations of the Divine inmost principle, Jesus Christ was so voluntarily, with a much fuller consciousness of the fact than we have yet attained. He elected before His birth to relinquish the plenitude of that blessedness and enjoyment which was His by virtue of His high spiritual station, prompted thereto by love for those whom He might thus deliver, by sharing with them their sinful and miserable condition. Such a blissful attainment of spiritual joy is here described as Nirvana (the chapter so headed being also very interesting), and Buddha is described as thus resolving to forego it, in order to deliver the brethren on lower planes of development. It occurred to me, however, on reading this, to consider why the Buddha, being represented as still in Nirvana, should not be conceived (so Christian mysticism conceives Christ) as still present with mankind to sympathise with and help them in the depths of their own spiritual, still accessible to prayer. Perhaps, however, he has now obtained the yet greater privilege (as this system of Theosophy strangely considers it) of Para-Nirvana, which is, we are informed, so very transcendental that nothing whatsoever can be predicated of it, and which, of course, would, by absorbing the Demi-God in God, render him utterly useless as respects any assistance he might otherwise have been able to render to the unfortunates not yet so happily circumstanced. We Christians must be permitted to wonder in that case why the Buddha ever allowed himself that somewhat selfish privilege, so long as he himself continued loving, and there remained any creatures wanting love. With our ways of thinking, such absorption into Impotent Abstraction would certainly not be the culmination of Divinity, but very much the reverse. But, probably, we shall be told that we are still in the gall and bitterness of anthropomorphism, Being, with a big B, far transcending any offices, or requirements of love, and righteousness; and we shall also be told that it is rather childish and degrading for grown-up men and women to want a Mediator, at all; that the Ideal needs not to be presented from without, but is to be attained rather by the assiduous contemplation of our own inner selves.—I will not say of our own navels, for I perceive, by the rebukes administered to "G.W., M.D." that Theosophists, unlike the poet's "Gentle Dulness," do not "dearly love a joke." Here are two salient points of difference between Buddhism and Christianity. Christians want an Ideal out of themselves, that they may, by contemplation and worship, realise it within; and they need the Ideal to be living, personal, able actively to help them, one with whom they may commune; with power to realise in themselves the spiritual beauty they desire. (I should, indeed, not have supposed that absolute consciousness was equal to none, unless Mr. Sinnett had assured us that this is the case.) I should have expected to find in the chapter on incarnations some allusions to Christ, and some attempt to harmonise the doctrine of the two religions on this head. But the attitude taken up seems rather that of somewhat contemptuous antagonism to Christianity. Indeed, I understand that the adepts of Thibet are disposed even to deny the bare historical existence of Jesus Christ—at least, of the character and career ascribed to Him by Christians. This, of course, drives us back to the so-called historical evidences of our faith; and for my part, although I disbelieved for a long time, I confess that a careful study of them has satisfied me that the adepts have arrived at a wrong conclusion. They would, probably, have had greater influence here had their attitude toward Christianity not been so uncompromisingly hostile; had they attempted to reconcile rather than emphasise conflicting claims. But since they appear to be certainly wrong on a question upon which all are capable of forming a judgment, their testimony upon other momentous questions, which we may be supposed not to have the same qualifications for deciding, is in proportion somewhat invalidated in our eyes—and a fortiori their pretension to infallibility. Otherwise, no doubt, as I believe "C.C.M." has urged, their special knowledge about the kinds of lives, and spheres of life, possibly even about cosmogony, and the destiny of the present world-system, might be conceded as arising out of special adept training, and peculiar powers so acquired; though their great metaphysical acumen, and higher spiritual wisdom might appear doubtful. Still, I think it would be very difficult thus to distinguish; and there can be no question that neither they themselves, nor their disciples would concede permission for any such distinction to be made. Yet if one's own superior virtue, and the acquirement of supernatural power, were the end sought by long and arduous discipline, that would certainly not be likely to confer deepest spiritual insight, which is the child of love. However, I confess that in this book Mr. Sinnett states one end of the adepts to be very impersonal. He says it is to save as many individuals as possible from final annihilation. But after all, I do not see how we can do otherwise than judge this alleged revelation, as we should do any other, by our own reason and conscience. That these may be but little illuminated is quite true; still, what else can any of us depend on? These adepts, unlike Christ and Buddha, keep themselves so aloof from the world that we have no opportunity of estimating their spiritual standing by their own deeds and words, save and except by these few glimpses they have chosen to vouchsafe of themselves in the few books and magazines recently published. And all I can say is that for my part I am not impressed by these at all in the same kind of way as I am impressed by the recorded words and deeds of Jesus the Christ, or even Gautama Buddha. These revelators appear to stand on a totally different plane. They give us some abstruse speculation, impart to us some alleged curious secrets, which may or may not be true, about the origin and destiny of man, of the earth, and of the stars; but though they travel far afield, they do not seem to penetrate profoundly either the nature of things or of the human spirit. They do not help us to know ourselves. There is no fresh self-evidencing, revealing, illuminating power in what they utter, or in the rather grotesque marvels they accomplish. And after all, we can only take it on their own word that their final object in "avoiding our bad magnetism," and lying up in a cave away from their toiling and suffering fellow-creatures, is not their own advancement, but ultimately the spiritual benefit of our race in other lives, which they alone are able certainly to foresee. This may or may not be so. But, meanwhile, how do they prove to us that their knowledge of these and kindred topics is infallible, and to be trusted? Assuredly the miracles they have wrought—granting them to be genuine—prove nothing of the kind. They are merely marvels addressed to the senses, and no more, only proving the possession of occult lore, concerning the forces and phenomena of nature, whether organic, inorganic, or both. The doctrine must be judged on its own merits; and though a teacher's wisdom may be greater than our own, it is of no use to us until the doctrine he teaches commends itself to us as true, and valuable for the conduct of human life. Then his wisdom becomes ours, though without his ours might have failed to be kindled. Some may feel these teachings to fulfil these conditions. I can only say that for me, and many of my friends, whose intuitions in these regions I respect, they fail to do so. They appear to fail both metaphysically, and spiritually. They are unsatisfying to the deepest needs of the soul, as well as to our firm conviction of what is intellectually true. To the retort that this is mere presumption on our part in face of the claims put forward by these Brethren, and the veneration felt for them by many in India, as also by some here, of course there is no answer possible. We must all follow our lights, though also looking for assistance from others, feeble as these lights may be.

* But "G.W., M.D." says he was told authoritatively that the will itself is matter in motion. To such a depth of materialism, even I should never have supposed Indian thought could have descended. Clearly, however, I was right that Theosophy does regard the thinking, willing Ego as a subtle ether, a strange misconception that has been exposed over and over again. Either, like other matter, is an object, not a subject. Roast beef helps to write a Hamlet, but it is not Hamlet. And if it were reduced to a gaseous state, it would be no nearer a work of spiritual genius than before.

Now, my general objection to this system is that, though it speaks, indeed, of Nirvana, and of a yet sublimer state where consciousness merges into unconsciousness, where "naught is everything, and everything is naught"—yet our present defective consciousness is after all hypostatized, and made absolute. The cosmogony and world-destiny propounded seem distinctly to imply this. For we are told "that which antedates every manifestation of the universe, and even lies beyond the limit of manifestation, is that which underlies the manifested universe within our purview—matter animated by motion, its Parabrahm or Spirit." (And here one would desire to protest against so extraordinary a use of the word spirit, for motion, or energy of matter! whereas the nearly universally recognised meaning of the word is either conscious individuality, intelligent will, or the profounder, and more excellent conscious sphere of such individuality, the regenerated "new man.") "Matter, space, motion, and duration constitute one and the same eternal substance of the universe." "There is nothing else eternal absolutely." (P. 183-4.) Then the exponent expressly disclaims for the adepts even the agnostic attitude regarding a personal God. "No such conception enters into the great esoteric doctrine of nature." Whether this is Atheism, or not, of course depends on what we mean by Theism. If "Theism" may mean the worship of absolute matter, space, motion, and duration, then, no doubt, this may be Theism—certainly not otherwise. And if it may mean this, then any word may bear any meaning, which tends rather to confusion. Why not honestly confess that the system is an atheistic one? The mere word will not bite us! But nothing, surely, can be more unphilosophical than to contrast, as is done here, the conception of universal natural law, as obtaining in the universe, with the conception of intelligent Divine Will as ruling it. Law, order, is the only conceivable evidence we can have of such intelligent Divine Will governing the world. The very idea of order involves intelligence originating and directing. Again, "the one eternal, imperishable thing in the universe, which universal pralayas themselves pass over without destroying, is that which may be regarded indifferently as space, duration, matter, or motion;" and then the exponent expressly guards himself against the far more philosophical conception of Spinoza by adding: "not as something having these four attributes, but as something which is these four things at once and always." So there is no eternal substance, as in Spinoza, having the attributes of thought and extension. But the substance and origin of all is (abstract) matter, motion, space, and duration! And now we see what Maya means—a conception triumphantly pointed to by "C. C. M." as proving the idealism of Hindoo thought, so much more thorough and ancient than ours!

"All things are Maya—transitory states—except the one element which rests during the mahapralayas only—the nights of Brahma"—that "androgynous element," Matter-Motion, having just been defined. (P. 177.) Again: "Brahmum, or Parabrahm, is a passive (?), incomprehensible, unconscious principle, but the essence, one life, or energy of the universe." "It acts only through Prakriti, matter,"—"everything takes place through the inherent energy of matter." Mr. Sinnett himself defines "the adept esoteric philosophy" as "transcendental Materialism." Of course it is. And thus my former position against "C. C. M." is distinctly justified. It is not a gross, vulgar Materialism, for it knows of matter in all kinds of states and in all degrees of density, knows also of an unconscious Principle of Matter, its cause and substance. Consciousness, then, is a function of matter, though of matter, "O so thin!" and "Spirit" (!) "the seventh—the universal Principle"—"the only God recognised by esoteric knowledge" (p. 179)—is expressly defined as "motion," Motion animating Matter. (P. 183.) This is the active principle, "matter" being properly the passive.

The conception of world-cycles is no doubt imaginatively magnificent, but they are here rather too accurately defined, perhaps, for poetry. And while everything arose primordially from unconscious matter and motion (Duration), by the way, occupies in this Quaternity of the esoteric Pantheon rather an anomalous, illogical, uncomfortable, and undefined position—one does not quite see how it gets into such high company at all!), everything will ultimately return thither. Then all will be quiet again. Quiet will reign. And after? pertinently asks "C. C. M." For after the great Kosmic Pralaya, there are no more Dhyan Chohans to wake the universe up again. Whereas in the more limited world-system pralayas, there are always some of these at hand (gods, or planetary Spirits of high development) to perform that office for the particular solar system that has gone to sleep. And if it be replied that the universe is now gone to sleep for ever, the question will still have to be faced, what woke it up originally?

But, says Mr. Sinnett, the periods spoken of are so enormous that really it is absurd to inquire further. In all conscience, we may rest satisfied with what is before us, even though, having attained to the height of God-like consciousness, we should after that prove not to be immortal after all, but destined to merge in the universal and Absolute Unconscious, which is defined to be Matter-Motion, or Space—Duration. Now, I cannot take this view, though certainly, when you put it in this way, it does sound a little greedy to "ask for more"! Yet, seriously, is the game worth the candle for adepts and such-like?—to live through many cycles labouring and suffering lives, in order to attain individual bliss, and deliver some egos from the earlier annihilation, which is reserved for so many of us, if after all they, and everybody else be destined ultimately to the annihilation, which cannot be distinguished practically, if it may theoretically, from that which is reserved for the wicked and foolish? "To ask if Nirvana means annihilation," says Mr. Sinnett, "is like asking if the last penalty of the law be identical with the highest honours of the Peerage." Granted; but what if the last penalty of the law be after all in store even for those who have already attained these highest honours of the Peerage? When the Dhyan Chohans—the most God-like souls—have reached the last hour of their perfected conscious life, will not all their previous lives appear to them as very nothing in the retrospect? So to an old man his long life appears to him. And what if he has blank annihilation only before him then? Will it not be far more horrible to renounce perforce the life of a good, beneficent, wise and almost omnipotent God than to renounce that of a mere puny man, who can look back only on a few years of comparative failure on this planet? "What has it all been for?" he will exclaim. "Would that I had been extinguished in the blind and imperfect beginning! The cruel mockery practised on me by that crass, unreasonable supreme God, Matter-Motion, would then have seemed a little less monstrous and unjust." Time surely is a mere relative conception of the limited, still defective, human mind. We know that an interval which appears slow to one may be like a flash of lightning to another, or vice-versa. Duration is purely relative to the conscious being that experiences it, depending on the special constitution of his experiencing faculty. Even opium and hashish completely modify our concepts of space and time, while there is the fourth dimension of Zöllner and the mathematicians. Duration is and can be nothing but the succession of feelings or ideas belonging to a one and self-identical conscious subject, capable of comparing, distinguishing, and remembering them, who also knows himself to be the same individual amid the flux and change of his sensations and thoughts, for else no comparison of them were possible, and so no duration. Hence, to the God-like and developed spirit, the whole conception of duration may be different, and an experience which might appear long and almost endless to the larva-soul of an earthly man might probably be gathered into one glorious flash of consciousness for the God-like. But after this, good-bye! Matter-Motion, the blind god, has devoured its own children, and eternal night has settled upon all, to the stultification of its own unconscious, and therefore stupid, chance-directed, efforts!

But I object to such a system, because (as I have pointed out in other essays respecting scientific conceptions of man and his destiny) I cannot conceive the possibility of matter and motion ever issuing in or producing consciousness, our human individuality, the characteristic of which is recognised unity or self-identity through successive changes, while that of matter, space, duration, and motion is multiplicity, infinite self-diversity, without internal principle of gathering the diversity, succession, and change into one and the same focus of unity, so that the diverse elements may be compared, identified, and distinguished. In short, Matter is a mere abstract idea of the mind, formed from a certain definite group of concrete sensational concepts, such as hardness, resistance, shape, colour, extent. Motion is an abstract idea formed from our experience of the change of position inter se of certain groups of shape, colour, and extent. Of Force, or Energy, as Hume shewed long ago, we have no experience at all outside ourselves, though he should have added that when our own felt energy, or force, is resisted, then we have such experience; but it is only in relation to our own energy that we have, or can have, any knowledge of external energy. We may infer it from the phenomenon of change, but that is all. But intelligent, conscious force, or energy, that of Will, is the only Force, or Energy, we can have any idea of, having experience of it in ourselves. Conscious spirit is self-creating, and creative of the world of phenomena. Its nature is activity. And, as I have shewn in the Modern Review, since all existence implies self-identity and distinction, nothing can exist out of one or many conscious subjects, for here alone can you get the principle of self-identification and distinction, uniting the changing and diverse qualities in one focus of self-identity, and distinguishing them inter se, distinguishing also the particular one existence from others similar, yet different. Hence dead, blind, material things can exist in perception or thought only. Time and space being mental constructions, general moulds of our thinking process, cannot exist out of such process. The "laws of nature" are only our interpretation of the Activity outside our individuality, that must necessarily partake of the limitation and peculiar character of our own perceiving, thinking faculty. But this Activity, being intelligible to us in some degree, must necessarily be conceived as intelligent, as akin to our perceiving and thinking faculty; and since it is Energy, producing an effect upon our intelligence, it must be akin to our intelligent Will. What these materialistic systems, whether gross or subtle, do, is to take our sensations and conceptions (which necessarily imply conscious conceptions and perceivers like ourselves), and then put them crudely and arbitrarily outside ourselves, but in no other similar intelligent thinkers and feelers, hypostatizing them in that impossible condition—even falling down in worship before them as primordial powers, or unconscious (!) gods, existing before men and all other intelligences, one day waking up for no particular reason, and urged by no special stimulus, to produce these intelligences, men amongst the number, after first producing the ordered Kosmos of Stars, with their inorganic elements, plants, and animals. Thus Materialists are like the child in Browning's poem, who feigns that the hobby horse he himself carries is, indeed, carrying him! Wherein after all does the Oriental materialism differ essentially from that of Buchner with his Kraft und Stoff? For Kraft we have here motion rather than energy; and for Stoff we have all sorts of subtle ethers; but they are all equally incapable of passing into conscious spirit, however thin and subtle they may be. They, on the other hand, all matter, whether gross or subtle, all material forces, too, felt and known only through sensation, such as attraction, electricity, galvanism, magnetism, are as such only the objects of consciousness, not the subjects of it. They are not, and can never become themselves conscious, though they are objects of consciousness in their effects upon us.* But as phenomenal objects of consciousness, or as felt in their effects, they cannot even be conceived to exist, save as felt and conceived by us, or by intelligences akin to ours, through comparison and memory of a one self-identified unity of consciousness, which we name personality, or, if you please, individuality. Motion, duration, matter, space, as well as all the particular things capable of being classified under any one of these conceptions, all involve perception, abstraction, sensation, conception, memory, comparison, and self-identification in a thinker. Therefore they cannot exist at all apart from him. And, therefore, they cannot exist before him to produce him, because they all imply his prior, or, at least, contemporaneous existence, in order for them to be possible. In short, they are ideas or conceptions of the human mind, and hence the human mind supports and produces them; not they it.

That is why all these philosophical systems appear to those who think as I do positively crude and childish, as well as untrue and unsatisfactory. You hypostatize your own notions, innocently imagining that they produced you, while you all the time are producing them; though, indeed, your own Ideas in your eternal real Being are substantial, and are the basis of your phenomenal conceptions. Is there, then, nothing outside us at all? With all my heart. There may be a whole world of intelligent consciousness, but nothing (so far as I can see) by any possibility out of, or beyond, that. If matter and motion, duration and space, do exist outside us, and outside every human mind, they can only, by the very terms of their existence, by their very notion, and by the meaning of their names, exist in other minds more or less akin to the human. You may go deeper than that, I quite agree. You may ask, what is the Principle or essential nature of these notions in us, and in others? We may have a glimpse of an answer to that question, but on the whole we shall have to reply, an unknown X. Since, however, they are partly products of consciousness, this X must be partly the principle of consciousness. And again, since there is a felt spontaneous, originating activity in the mind, this principle must have the nature of consciousness, especially as the unconscious, "separated from consciousness by the whole diameter of being," cannot be conceived capable of producing it. The originating principle of an effect must be greater than, or, at least, equal to itself. A deeper consciousness, then, underlies our present phenomenal and successive imperfect consciousness, underlies it with all its notions and sensations; deeper and fuller notions, or Ideas, therefore, are the substance of all such material concepts as matter, motion, duration, and space. The Substance and Origin of all, therefore, is individual conscious Spirit; and diversity—subject and object—being essential to consciousness, as well as to love, and love being the highest form of consciousness we can conceive, the Divine substantial Intelligence must be, not one only, but many also—there must be many individualities in one universal consciousness, they all partaking of one another's attributes and experience by sympathy and co-operation. These individualities do not begin and end absolutely. They are eternal, and are the substance of the (so-called) external Kosmos. But their Divine conscious substance is deeper than their phenomenal manifestation in the fleeting shadow-consciousness we know; and many are in one, many of these ones in a higher one, and so, up to the Supreme One. Instead of its being true that there is no personal God, the truth is that there is nothing but personal God. The Supreme Spirit—Father of the Hierarchy—could not be conscious of Himself were He not eternally so, through the idea He derives from the Eternal Son, in Whom all other creature spirits eternally are, the Holy Ghost being the Divine energy of Father and Son, regenerating the lapsed and developing creatures, or phenomenal souls, who are in them. But the Son is as necessary to the Father as the Father to the Son. The All, in its eternal, real solidarity, and loving union, is God.

It is surely strange, Nirvana being admitted, not to recognise that the Ideas constituting consciousness in Nirvana must be more perfect, real, and substantial than our actually existing, and often contradictory conceptions—that these Ideas, rather than our present notions, must give the true explanation of things as we feel, perceive, and think them now. Yet this imperfect, contradictory system of conception is made absolute when it is made the basis of an elaborate explanation of the whole scheme of things, matter and motion being postulated as an absolute beginning and an absolute ending—originating and swallowing up even Nirvana, the higher system of consciousness (!)—which, on the contrary (unless the greater can come out of the less), should surely be the basis, explanation, and origin of this lower system of consciousness, including time, space, matter, and motion, if only we could attain to, and so comprehend it.

Nirvana (p. 163) is called "absolute universal consciousness." But yet a struggle is represented as taking place in a Buddha as to whether he shall relinquish the bliss which he has earned in order to help those who need him. (Pp. 164-165.) Therefore, after all, it would seem to be a mere ecstatic, and rather unreal subjective condition of the individual.* The universal life must touch and nourish every particular life. God we conceive to be omniscient, and all sympathising because the substance and being of all. But the more god-like you become, according to this doctrine, the less do you appear able to apprehend, and feel with the needs of those wanting the fullness of life, which you possess. Surely, in this condition, however ecstatic and transcendental, you must be receding from the true Divine. One can almost imagine, after this, and feel reconciled to, its falling over into blind Matter and Motion again.

This rather materialistic rationale of the universe seems to bear a somewhat suspiciously close resemblance to the results of Western science, although expanded, completed, and rendered more subtle by the subtle Oriental mind. We have Darwin's Evolution and Spencer's Unknowable, and Laplace's Nebular Hypothesis, all endorsed, and only arranged into a more comprehensive system of thought. But Western science is a shifting thing, varying in its hypotheses from day to day like a chameleon, or a kaleidoscope. However, of course the claim is that this system is part of a most ancient body of Dogma, originally revealed by a divine individual. And it certainly does seem to recall the cosmogonies one has studied in very ancient classical writings, such as the Orphic Fragments, where gods and men alike are said to have been produced by ancient Night, and to be destined to revert thither. But one had always hoped that this symbolised some more transcendent and spiritual idea than merely that of an abstract material principle, or even than the Unknowable of Herbert Spencer, the Unconsciousness of Hartmann, and Schelling's Principle of Absolute Indifference. The Eleatic One, the One of Plotinus and Proclus, seems far more sublime, however impossible it may be for such an abstract, undifferentiated unit ever to become many, as yet it evidently has done. You may say the Many is "illusion," yet here it is, and saying that does not account for what is. The One is empty and barren—the many is rich, living, and fertile.†

I have one more objection, and then have done. The doctrine of Devachan is no doubt an extremely ingenious concession to the weakness of human affection. Many of us ordinary mortals, who have not quenched all human fires among the snows of Himalaya, are still troubled with warm human affections, and desire a future life, chiefly in order that Love, who has not found her full

* This contention as regards Nirvana, is, I see, expressly admitted by one of the adepts themselves, in a letter read by Mr. Sinnett, at a soiree given by the Theosophical Society. He there confesses that Nirvana is, after all, a selfish ecstasy, and that our immediate business is to help others. That letter is on a higher plane than anything else I have happened to see, professing to emanate from the same quarter—and it is even just to the higher mystical Christianity. I would here express my gratitude for the too rare utterances of "J. W. F.," from whom, though I cannot go with him entirely, I have learned very much. ("Light," August 18th.) Mrs. Penny, too, gives us admirable expositions of, and extracts from, the gr. at seer, Dharma.

† Grant, the great friend, let alle theorie, und grän des Leben's goldener baum, since Goethe. But I cannot away with this worship of Ether! The fancy of Spiritualists and Occultists that matter in the gaseous or ethereal form is a much more dignified and intelligent God than matter more solid and visible has always appeared to me very funny. Yet writers like Eliphas Levi speak of this Ether with bated breath, and endow it with all the titles and attributes of Divinity.

were all things created"; but let it be remembered that a word includes letters, even in our language; in the Word that God spoke, by which all that exists was made, every lesser spiritual agent is necessarily included. Let Böhme explain my meaning: "As the Alphabet is the whole understanding of all things or substances, so is God's Word the only and sole understanding of all things, and the Angels are its letters." . . . "As a man with his senses and thoughts, governeth the World and all things or substances; so God the Eternal Unity, ruleth all things through the management and doings of the Angels; only the power and the work is God's." . . . "The visible world is no other than the outflow Word, with both the central fires, which have again made to themselves a subject or object with or out of the outward elementary fire, wherein the outward creatures live." (Theosophic Quest, 5, par. 20. Ibid, 6 pars. 7, 41.) Thus can I, a little help myself to understand the connection of the world soul and individual man's. As to what Böhme designates elsewhere (Mydnerum Magnum, chap. 22, verso 4), "the Elemental Conception, viz., the body which the Eus hath attracted to itself," I can believe that the original soul of man was the pre-existent fire that, in temporary abeyance of conscious life, worked out its divisional ultimates—body—through and with the ultimated body of the world soul on which it still has the basis of all animal life; just as I believe the physical particles, and the spirits of the particles of my hand or foot to be the outcome of my animal soul; and both the world soul and that of every human being are the product of the ceaseless working of the seven Spirits of Eternal Nature: out of harmony in both, and consequently making our world and our nature what they are.

And it seems to me that Böhme's term "generating" is more likely to be accurate than "attracting" as to the molecular outbirth of soul; the attraction (I speak as a fool!) would begin from the spirit evolved from soul, for a higher spirit in descent, seeking out what it would best combine with, and assume and elevate.

And here we meet the omnipresent law of actives and passives, male and female, spirit and matter, the force that seeks a subordinated co-agent and the potential force that, being found, intensifies the power of its counterpart. Also, I dimly apprehend how the spirit of the universal Adam descending may thus have assumed the world-soul, when on the sixth creative cycle its astral spirit was evolved, when the understanding which, according to Böhme wakens with the predominance of the sixth form of eternal nature, was ready to receive the perfecting completion of the seventh. By this assumption, his frequent saying of man having all beasts in himself—and Van Helmont's "The body of Adam was made out of the dust of Adamah" . . . "and every least dust of this dust is a creature hidden as yet," are explained.

And, finally, when once we grasp the idea of humanity being a sum total of the antecedents of life on every lower plane; the spirit of man having assumed the lowest and worked its way upwards, and every human body being constituted of myriads of spiritual entities awaiting their future development on a similar route, we not only see what has been gained by man having been made lower than the angels and ultimated in matter, but we see what was effected by the Word being made flesh. In assuming the human soul the first-begotten Son of God took man into His nature, made man capable of sharing His progress from glory to glory, as more and more a victor He subdues all things to love, till having destroyed all the works of the adversary, death is conquered and God is all in all.

A PROTEST OF THEOSOPHISTS.

Copies of the following "protest," signed by upwards of 500 Hindu Theosophists, reached us a few mails ago with a request for publication in these columns. Setting aside the question of space, it was manifestly impossible to print such a large number of names from, in many cases, badly written and illegible MSS., and after consultation with an official member of the Indian Theosophical Society, now in this country, we determined to publish the text of the "protest" and a selection of the names attached to that which emanated from the parent society. Beyond that we may mention that "protests" have come to hand from societies in all parts of India, each mail for some time past having brought us a bundle of these letters.—Editor of LIGHT.

SIR,—The undersigned Hindu Theosophists having been made acquainted with the expressions used by "G. W., M. D." in your journal, with respect to Aryan Esoteric Philosophy and our revered Mahatmas, do indignantly protest. Such language as the gentleman has indulged in, every Hindu whether educated or not would regard as shocking and blasphemous, evincing in its author a bad heart, bigotted prejudice, and the grossest ignorance about our ancient Philosophy and Esoteric Science.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[It is preferable that correspondents should append their names and addresses to communications. In any case, however, these must be supplied to the Editor as a guarantee of good faith.]

Esoteric Buddhism and its Critic.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

"BORROW. Let me play the lion. . . . I will roar, that I will do any man's heart good to hear me. . . . I will make the Duke say. . . . 'Let him roar, let him roar again' . . . Masters, you ought to consider with yourselves; to bring in, God shield us! a lion among ladies is a most dreadful thing; for there is not a more fearful wild-fowl than your lion, and we ought to look to it. . . . Nay, you must name his name, and half his face must be seen through the lion's neck, and he himself must speak through, saying thus, or to the same defect—'Ladies, or fair ladies, (or Theosophists) . . . I would ask you, or I would request you, or I would entreat you, not to fear, not to tremble. If you think I came hitherto as a lion . . . no, I am no such thing: I am a man . . . and then, indeed, let him name his name.'" (Mulanma r Night's Dream.)

SIR,—In "LIGHT" of July 21st, in the "Correspondence," appears a letter signed "G. W., M.D." Most transparent initials these which "name the name" at once, and shew the writer's face "through the lion's neck." The communication consists of just fifty-eight paragraphs, containing an equal number of sneering, rancorous, vulgar personal flings, the whole distributed over three and a-half columns. It pretends to criticize, while only misquoting and misinterpreting Eastern Esotericism. Its author would create a laugh at the expense of Mr. Sinnett's book, and succeeds in shewing us what a harmless creature is the "lion"—"wild-fowl" though he may be; and where he would make a show of wit, the letter is only—nasty.

I should not address your public, even in my private capacity, but that the feelings of many hundreds of my Asiatic Brothers have been outraged by this, to them, ribald attack upon what they hold sacred; for them, and at their instance—I protest. It might be regarded as beneath contempt, had it come from an outsider upon whom rested no obligation to uphold the dignity of the Theosophical Society; in such case it would have passed for a clumsy attempt to injure an unpalatable cause—that of Esoteric Buddhism. But, when it is a wide open secret that the letter came from a member of about five years' standing and one who, upon the prolongation of the "British Theosophical Society" as the "London Lodge of the Theosophical Society," retained membership, the case has quite another aspect. The cutting insult having been inflicted publicly, and without antecedent warning, it appears necessary to inquire as to the occult motive.

I shall not stop to remark upon the wild résumé, which, professedly "a criticism from a European and arithmetical standpoint," passed muster with you. Nor shall I lose time over the harmless flings at "incorrigible Buddhists and other lunatics," beyond remarking a propos of "moon" and "dust-bins," that the former seems to have found a good symbol of herself as "a dust-bin" in the heads of those whose perceptive faculties seem so dusty as to prevent the entrance of a single ray of occult light. Briefly then, since the year 1879, when we came to India, the author of the letter in question has made attempts to put himself into communication with the "Brothers." Besides trying to enter into correspondence with Colonel Olcott's guru, he sent twice, through myself, letters addressed to the Mahatmas. Being, as it appears, full of one-sided, prejudiced questions, suggesting to Buddhist philosophers the immense superiority of his own "Esoteric" Christianity over the system of the Lord Buddha, which he characterised as fruitful of selfishness, human blindness, misanthropy and spiritual death, they were returned by the addressees for our edification, and to shew us why they would not notice them. Whoever has read a novelette, contributed by this same gentleman to the Psychological Review and entitled "The Man from the East," will readily infer what must have been his attitude towards the "Himalayan" and Tibetan mystics; a Scotch doctor, the hero, meets at a place in Syria, in an Occult Brotherhood, a Christian convert from this "Himalayan heathen Brotherhood," who, a Hindu—utters against his late adept masters the self-same libels as are now repeated in the letter under notice.*

The shot at Theosophy being badly aimed, flew wide of the mark; but still, like Richard III., "G. W., M.D.," resolved, as it appears, to keep up the gunnery—

"If not to fight with foreign enemies,"

Yet to beat down these rebels here at home."

The three indignant answers called out by "G. W., M.D.," having emanated from an English lady and two genuine English gentlemen, are, in my humble opinion, too dignified and mild for the present case. So brutal an attack demanded something stronger than well-bred protests; and at the risk of being taken by "G. W., M.D." as the reverse of "well-bred," I shall use * The mythical hero of the story would seem to have met at Paris with a certain pseudo Brahmin, a convert to Roman Catholicism, who is giving himself out as an ex-chela of the Hindu Mahatmas. As he is neither a Brahmin nor was ever a chela, his statements and all corroborative ones to the contrary, notwithstanding—he may have misled, if not the mythical Scotch doctor, at least the actual "M.D." of London. And, by-the-way, our French Fellows may as well know, that unless this pretender ceases his bogus revelations as to the phenomenal powers of our Mahatmas being "of the devil," a certain native gentleman who has known this convert of the Jesuits from childhood, will expose him most fully.—H. P. B.

plain words about this wilful friend, but now traitor;—I hope to shew the term is not too harsh. As an ardent Theosophist, the grateful, loyal friend of the author denounced—who deserves and has the regard of Mahatma Koot-Hoomi—and as the humble pupil of those to whom I owe my life, and the future of my soul, I shall speak. While I have breath, I shall never allow to pass unnoticed such ugly manifestations of religious intolerance, nay, bigotry, and personal rancour resulting from envy, in a member of our Society.

Before closing I must notice one especially glaring fact. Touched evidently to the quick by Mr. Sinnett's very proper refusal to let one so inimical see the "Divine face" (yes, truly Divine, though not so much so as the original) of the Mahatma, "G. W., M.D." with a suer of equivocal propriety, calls it a mistake. "For just," says he, "as some second-class saints have been made by gazing on half-penny prints of the Mother of God, so who can say that if my good friend had permitted my sceptical eyes to look on the Divine face of Koot-Hoomi I might not forthwith have been converted into an Esoteric Buddhist?"

Impossible; an Esoteric Buddhist never broke his pledged word; and one who upon entering the Society gave his solemn Word of Honour, in the presence of witnesses, that he would "defend the interests of the Society and the honour of a brother Theosophist, when unjustly assailed, even at the peril of my (his) own life," and then could write such a letter, would never be accepted in that capacity. One who unjustly assails the honour of hundreds of his Asiatic Brothers, slurs their religion and wounds their most sacred feelings, may be a very Esoteric Christian, but certainly is a very disloyal Theosophist. My perceptions of what constitutes a man of honour may be very faulty, but, I confess that I could not imagine such a one to make public caricatures upon confessedly "private instructions." (See second column, paragraph 14 of his letter.) Private instructions of this sort, given at confidential private meetings of the Society in advance of their publication, are exactly what the entering member's "word of honour" pledges him not to reveal. "Esoteric Buddhist?" No, tell him—

"Thy broken faith hath made thee prey for worms;

What canst thou swear by now?"

Your correspondent deprecates "at the outset this Oriental practice of secrecy"; he knows, "that Secrecy and Cunning are ever twin sisters," and it appears to him "childish and effeminate" to pretend "by secret words and signs to enshrine great truths behind a veil, which is only useful as a concealment of ignorance and nakedness." Indeed! so he is not an "Esoteric Christian" after all, else I have misread the Bible. For what I find there in various passages, of which I cite but one, shews me that he is as disloyal to his own Master and Ideal-Christ, as he is to Theosophy:—"And He said unto them, (His own disciples) 'unto you it is given to know the mystery of the Kingdom of God; but unto them that are without, (the "G. W., M.D.'s" of the day!) all these things are done in parables, that seeing they may see, and not perceive; and hearing they may hear, and not understand; lest at any time they should be converted, and their sins should be forgiven them.'" (Mark iv. 11, 12.)

Shall we characterise this also as "childish and effeminate" say that the twin sisters "Secrecy and Cunning" lurk behind this veil, and that in this instance, as usual, it was "only useful as a concealment of ignorance and nakedness"? The grandeur of Esoteric Buddhism is, that it hides what it does from the vulgar, not "lest at any time they should be converted, and their sins forgiven them," or as they would say "cheat their Karma"—but, lest by learning prematurely that which can safely be trusted only to those who have proved their unselfishness and self-abnegation, even the wicked, the sinners should be hurt.

And now, may the hope of Bottom be realised, and some London Duke say to this harmless lion, "Let him roar, let him roar again."

Esoteric Buddhism

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—"C. C. M.," in his answer to Mrs. Penny ("LIGHT," July 14th, p. 323), says:—"To know what Christianity is as a religion of the world, I must take what Christians and Christian Churches believe," and further that the Archbishop of Canterbury "is a representative of that power in the world, which we call Christianity." Are we to take the monks of Central Asia and the Grand Lama of Tibet as our exponents of Buddhism? Is it a doctrine of Buddhism that a woman cannot take to herself an additional husband, without first paying two or three cows to the priest? Are we to look upon the water-wheels, which keep written prayers in motion night and day, as Buddhist institutions, which they certainly are? Or are we to make pilgrimages, as they do in Central Asia, to look for the glory of Buddha in the mists seen from the top of a vast precipice?

Is the letter of "A Catholic Priest" ("LIGHT," No. 137), to be taken as an evidence that the Catholic Church believes in Re-incarnation, and agrees with Esoteric Buddhism? I fancy the writer would receive scant countenance from his ecclesiastical superiors in his bold utterance.

"C. C. M." quotes Colonel Ingersoll's remarks on the quotation from the New Testament—"He that believeth and is baptised shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned." The whole essence of these remarks depends on the meaning of the last word, and though Colonel Ingersoll may be unacquainted with it, I should expect "C. C. M." to be better informed, and to be fully aware that the meaning attached to it by many theologians is wholly unwarranted. If we used the English (or rather Latin) word in its true meaning, we should probably read in the morning papers that so-and-so had been damned to pay a fine of five shillings for being drunk, and whatever be the truth in question, the man who has the evidence before him, or even the means of obtaining the evidence, and either cannot believe, or refuses to examine, is undoubtedly damned to bear whatever penalty attaches to his consequent ignorance. This, of course, will be great or small in proportion to the character of the truth involved, and with regard to Christianity will be, if this be true, not quite as serious as we are told will be the consequences of our mistakes at the conclusion of a manvantara. The Greek word translated damned in the old version, and condemned in the revised version of the New Testament, is in no case entitled to bear the common theological acceptance of the old version.

The damnation of Esoteric Buddhism is far worse than that of the New Testament, the condemnation of which is no doubt to suffering, but in all cases for the purpose of purification, while according to the Buddhist teaching, that which is found reprobate is thrown to a real destruction.

Your correspondent "Vera" repeats the assertion that Jesus was a Buddhist, but He certainly taught a doctrine the very opposite of that laid down by the secretary of the Theosophical Society in the words "There is no God, personal or impersonal," and He never taught any doctrine from which we could infer the Esoteric Buddhist idea of the continued re-incarnations. His own direction as regards the teaching, which His hearers could not bear at that time, was that it would come from the Comforter, the Spirit of Truth, whom the Father would send. The only adeptship known to His disciples is that obtained by this teaching which, though it does explain and enlarge what He said, cannot contradict it. The dispensation under which we live, and which He came to bring into the world, is that of direct communion with the Holy Spirit, and we need not that any man teach us, whether that man be the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Pope of Rome, or the mythical Koot Hoomi.

Those who talk and write about Buddhism should first recollect that Buddha cannot have been the name of a man. The ancient meaning of the word, one still in use in the oldest language known, shews how it was adopted. It is simply another name for the Lingam, the oldest idol known to man, worshipped as a symbol of creation, and its use is only an instance of the transference of names, as of festivals, from one phase of faith to another, accomplished by those who brought in and preached a new doctrine.

"C. C. M." must admit that he has been discussing a philosophy which, though called Buddhist, cannot be even known to one Buddhist in ten thousand, and of which most likely not one thousand of those now living have ever heard. The proportion of those called Christians, who know something of the foundation of Christianity, is infinitely greater, and seeing that, save in the Church of Rome, independent judgment with regard to the Bible is not only allowed, but preached as a right and a duty, "C. C. M." has no right to take his Christianity from other than the admitted source, which is the New Testament.

Creeds and theologies belong to sects who have practically, in putting them forth, said: "God gave us a revelation. But unfortunately He did not know how to make it clear to men, and now we have done this." The result is that ere long men quarrel over the meanings of the creeds and theologies, more bitterly than they did over the Bible, and simply add to the confusion which they had formerly created. Take as an instance of such confusion the two words quoted by "C. C. M." from the second Article of the Church of England, "Original guilt." Such a phrase is not to be found in the Bible, though men may argue that certain passages have a meaning which warrants the expression. With regard to Christianity, moreover, the candid observer must admit that there is among those classed as Christians no divergence of doctrine so great as is to be noted between Esoteric Buddhism and the doctrines and practices of the Tibetan and Chinese Buddhists. Nearly all the different bodies of professing Christians admit, if they do not preach, the doctrine of the teaching of the Holy Spirit. Most of them hold the Deity of Jesus Christ, and the doctrine of the Vicarious Sacrifice, as to the moral effect of which I may, with your leave, say a word at another time; and they all believe in God the Creator and in Jesus Christ, the Redeemer, though they may differ as to the nature or mode of the redemption.

"C. C. M." is much too logical not to know that in attacking the Articles of the Church of England, he is dealing with what may be no necessary portion of Christianity, though it belongs to one of the Christian bodies. If a controversy is to be carried on between philosophical systems, let us conduct it on plainly recognised lines on both sides; not upon an inner philosophy on the one side, and a sectional superstition on the other. I notice in the communications which have appeared in "LIGHT," attacking Christianity, that in most cases the writers make one fact very clear, namely, that they have never taken the trouble to study either the Old or the New Testament, but have been ready to accept as Christian doctrine what they have obtained after it had been filtered through several human brains, rather than to go direct to the fountain for themselves. Let us not appeal to the Archbishop of Canterbury, when we can study the writings of St. Peter, St. Paul, and St. John, and the sayings of the Lord Jesus Christ.

H. T. HUMPHREYS.

Kennington.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I could not but expect that when the articles of such able writers as "Dr. W." and "M.A. (Oxon.*)" are subject to criticism, my simple views, however honestly and courteously stated, would share a like fate.

Though I might take exception to almost everything Mr. Gill says, respecting my communication in "LIGHT," I must especially protest against such a gratuitous expression (such, indeed, as critics too often allow themselves to indulge in) as "But, says Mr. Ditson in great glee." I wrote nothing in a mood in the slightest degree gleeful, but rather with regret that I had discovered no important revelation where much had been promised.

You will find in one of the early volumes of "Asiatic Researches" how a distinguished scholar (Mr. Colebrook, I think,) was deceived (and deeply mortified thereat) by a native Brahmin or Buddhist who assisted (!) him in some translation which he had undertaken. I have seen recently, in print also, that one of our ablest Sanscritists has written as follows respecting M. Jacolliot:—"Many of the words which M. Jacolliot quotes as Sanskrit are not Sanskrit at all; others never have the meaning which he assigns to them." (See "Chips from a German Work-shop," Vol. V.) A Brahmin, a friend, a graduate of the English College at Calcutta, assures me (after having read one or both of Mr. Sinnett's books,) that Mr. Sinnett's writings "are humbug." Now I do not agree with the Brahmin, and I regard Mr. Sinnett as highly honourable and intentionally truthful, but as mistaking the value of what he had to publish, "hearsays" being accepted as revelations; putting forth old ideas as new Buddhistic unfoldments; trying most honestly to shed light upon us, yet leaving us in the deep mist of Drachan.

The doctrine that there is one, but one, universal substance or principle, was promulgated, and, of course, ably sustained by Spinoza. Respecting the laws of light and of nature, of which "two years ago no living European" (and doubtless, or probably, it was intended to include poor uncultured America) "knew the alphabet of the science here put into scientific shape" (!)—(quoting Mr. Sinnett), I think our author and some of his teachers are mistaken. In a valuable work, "The Kabbala," by Dr. S. Pancoast, of Philadelphia; in some of Mr. Randolph's productions; in Dr. Draper's writings; in the Duchess de Pomar's, to say nothing of many more, every thought here advanced has been anticipated, except the method of evolution, the "corkscrew," as Mr. Massey calls it, by which all matter is to progress to perfection. I say matter; but it should be, perhaps, the "universal principle"; still, if this be but one, yet divisible into positive and negative, male and female, "non-existing," yet producing life when they come together (according to Mr. Sinnett)—and if of this one, "non-existing," angelic beings emanate, why this vast round, perchance of some millions of years (more or less in Deevchan or elsewhere), to effect what it is announced has already been effected by this "non-existing," yet productive, oneness?

Too much space would be required to give an analysis of what I, in my humble opinion, call illogical and unphilosophical in Mr. Sinnett's statements. I am, however, most willing to admit that I may not comprehend him.

"The views of Nature now put forward," says Mr. Sinnett, "are altogether unfamiliar to European thinkers." A reply to this has been partially made above, but I would here more particularly ask: What views? The exceptional view of evolution, unique in its method, and perchance true, will be, and is, gravely questioned, and with re-incarnation—here in the soul's vast round of unconsciousness till the end is reached—also in its unique method of evolution, has already been almost, if not quite, refuted by Mr. Gerald Massey. (See "LIGHT," August 25th.)

Again, Mr. Sinnett says:—"When a man is dead life is said to have departed from him; whereas life becomes the most potential from that very moment and awakens with a new vigour in every one of the molecules of the dead man—separately; Prana, the breath of life, stirs up every atom of the corpse." (P. 282.) Where is the proof? Per contra; put this corpse into a glass case, air exhausted, hermetically sealed, and I defy any manifestation that Prana can make upon it, except to let it alone—there alone, as inert matter through ages and ages. Put it in the ground, with moisture and warmth, and to be sure, it develops new forms. Or freeze the body and it will be a mass of dead material like those huge animals which have been found imbedded in ice in extreme northern latitudes. Where was Prana to make their particles fly round and "stir up their every atom"?

Further:—"When life has retired from the last particle of brain-matter his (man's) perceptive faculties become extinct for ever, and his spiritual powers of cognition and volition become for the time being as extinct as the other" and, "When a man dies his soul becomes unconscious and, loses all remembrances of things internal as well as external." (p. 88.) Now, do Mr. Sinnett's defenders accept this as a Divine disclosure coming from the Brothers? I do not so accept it, do not believe it; and I, from my high brotherhood of the spirit world, am authorised to proclaim it as false. But, kind readers, I do not ask you to accept my opinions any more than I would have you accept Mr. Sinnett's; for he gives us nothing in support of his assertion for instance, that "the tradition of countless ages is now being given up." His ipse dixit, without the showing, has no more intrinsic value than what is demonstrable to be untrue in the (supposed credible from their honourable source) productions above referred to, of Messrs. Colebrook and Jacolliot. My Hindu friend repudiates almost wholly and entirely everything Mr. Sinnett advances.

Mr. Gill, my critic, says: "This spiritual knowledge, exact and experimental as it is, cannot be proved upon paper, or tested in the laboratory." This is the reason why the teachings of the "Brothers" (in whose high spiritual endowments I believe) are so generally discredited—as were the Swedish seer's; but they are in harmony with the New Testament record that Heaven is within us and that we are gods.

"The object of the Mahatmas," further says Mr. Gill, "is to teach us . . . the way to work the great wonder of salvation ourselves, in which miraculous process miracles are but incidents of the march." I fear that here Mr. Gill is a little in the dark. Neither the Mahatmas nor any of the Oriental adepts believe in miracles. Everything is in accord with fixed laws. To learn how to become "saviours of ourselves," is, I think, no difficult matter; nor how to make gold; to make oneself insensible to pain, heat or cold; or, to make a plant grow from a seed in a few hours, or perhaps moments. By following the teachings of the gurus,—by isolation from the world, by fasting, contemplation (and prayer),—I have myself been enabled to rise through and become superior to matter; to see our earth rolling beneath me, and its little dark toilers digging there, heedless of the angel of light who seemed awaiting their looking up to him. I have risen in daylight to see one of the planets, Jupiter, I think, as a large black ball, holding its vast way in the heavens. All this may be a subject of ridicule, but that to me is of no consequence. I should say more if it had not the semblance of vanity.

Again, Mr. Gill, remarks on the "superiority of occult over spiritualistic methods." I conceive that there need be, and is, nothing "occult" in either. Both are purely spiritual, or if one does not comprehend it and cannot control his own forces, spiritual as well as physical, it is his own fault, and no guru can put into him the capacity. "One must become, but cannot be made an adept."

I am somewhat surprised that Mr. Gill presumes to use toward me the words "quibbles," and "jokes." I am not aware that there is a semblance of either in my plain (not elegant) statements of how I viewed Mr. Sinnett's "Occult World." I have had my own books reviewed favourably and unfavourably, and with perfect equanimity have read such, feeling that each critic had taken his own particular survey of my productions as he had a right to do, should do, and in fact, must do if honest.

G. L. DITSON, F.T.S.

"M.A. (Oxon.*)" and Homer.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Pray allow us to remind "M.A. (Oxon.*)" that so far from Homer regarding the physical body as the real man, and the rest as an empty vanishing shade (as stated in the opening "Note" in last "LIGHT"), Homer (as shown by Dr. Anna Kingsford, in her paper on "Re-incarnation," in "LIGHT," April 8th, 1882) represents Odysseus as saying of Hercules, on meeting him in Hades, "There, also, I descried the mighty Hercules—his phantom, I say, for, as for himself" (namely, his true soul), "he is enjoying himself at the table of the immortal gods. . . . And presently he—the phantom—recognised me, and on beholding me, spoke lamenting." (Odyssey XI.)

Mr. Cranston's recent letters in "LIGHT" contained several other classical instances, all in accordance with the theosophic view—a view which, nevertheless, does not for us depend on any authority, but has the full confirmation of our own experience.

Allow us at the same time to correct the impression likely to be produced by the paragraph at the bottom of the second column of p. 454.

As all things proceed from mind, mind is necessarily competent for the comprehension of all things. So that there is not "an infinity of truth beyond the reach of human reason." But all that that reason has to do is so to purify and expend itself as to become one with the infinite reason which has produced all things. It is not that truth is not infinite, but that reason, when perfected, is also infinite. There is nothing that is incomprehensible or cannot be understood.

The doctrine of the paragraph in question has ever been the stronghold of superstition, and worst enemy of the faith that is based on the "rock" of the understanding, the only faith that "saves."

Elizabeth Squirrel.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

DEAR SIR,—As further confirmation of the story of Elizabeth Squirrel may I say that some years since a surgeon in this city (now deceased), Mr. J. Crawford Bell, lent me the "Autobiography," assuring me at the same time that the case was therein described with entire truthfulness as he had proved for himself by personal observation.

About two months ago I purchased a copy of the same book from a second-hand bookstall here; on the flyleaf was written by the author.

R. C. P.—s.

"Here lies a simple and unvarnished story,

Its tissues are all woven of the 'True.'

It does not seek to merit aught of glory,

But only to impart a rightful hue.

"With M. E. Squirrel's kind regards."

Vision of Joseph Hoag.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Though I have not seen the vision of Joseph Hoag in print previous to its appearance in "LIGHT" for the 6th inst., it may be of some interest to you to know that its predictions, agreeing in their details with what appears in "LIGHT," were related to me in the year 1857 or 1858.—Yours, &c.,

TESTIMONY TO PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

The following is a list of eminent persons who, after personal investigation, have satisfied themselves of the reality of some of the phenomena generally known as Psychical or Spiritualistic.

N.B.—An asterisk is prefixed to those who have exchanged belief for knowledge.

SCIENCE.—The Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, F.R.S., President R.A.S.; W. Crookes, Fellow and Gold Medallist of the Royal Society; C. Varley, F.R.S., C.E.; A. R. Wallace, the eminent Naturalist; W. F. Barrett, F.R.S.E. Professor of Physics in the Royal College of Science, Dublin; Dr. Lockhart Robertson; *Dr. J. Elliotson, F.R.S., sometime President of the Royal Medical and Chirurgica, Society of London; *Professor de Morgan, sometime President of the Mathematical Society of London; *Dr. Wm. Gregory, F.R.S.E., sometime Professor of Chemistry in the University of Edinburgh; *Dr. Ashburner, *Mr. Rutter, *Dr. Herbert Mayo, F.R.S., &c., &c.

*Professor F. Zollner, of Leipzig, author of "Transcendental Physics," &c.; Professors G. T. Fechner, Scheibner, and J. H. Fichte, of Leipzig; Professor W. E. Weber, of Göttingen; Professor Hoffman, of Würzburg; Professor Perty, of Berne; Professors Wagner and Butleroff, of Petersburg; Professors Hare and Mapes, of U.S.A.; Dr. Robert Fries, of Breslau; Mons. Camille Flammarion, Astronomer, &c., &c.

LITERATURE.—The Earl of Dunraven; T. A. Trollope; S. C. Hall; Gerald Massey; Captain R. Burton; Professor Cassal, LL.D.; *Lord Brougham; *Lord Lytton; *Lord Lyndhurst; *Archbishop Whately; *Dr. R. Chambers, F.R.S.E.; *W. M. Thackeray; *Nassau Senior; *George Thompson; *W. Howitt; *Serjeant Cox; *Mrs. Browning, Hon. Roden Noel, &c., &c.

Is it Conjuring?

It is sometimes confidently alleged that mediums are only clever conjurers, who easily deceive the simple-minded and unwary. But how, then, about the conjurers themselves, some of the most accomplished of whom have declared that the "manifestations" are utterly beyond the resources of their art?

SAMUEL BELLACHINI, COURT CONJURER AT BERLIN.—I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butler of, in St. Petersburg; to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the "How" of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a Notary and witnesses.—(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI, Berlin, December 6th, 1877.

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION OF SPIRITUALISTS.

38. GREAT RUSSELL STREET, BLOOMSBURY, LONDON, W.C.

(Entrance in WOBURN STREET.)

THIS ASSOCIATION was formed for the purpose of uniting Spiritualists of every variety of opinion in an organised body, with a view of promoting the investigation of the facts of Spiritualism, and of affording to all inquirers in their researches by providing them with the best means of investigation. The Association is governed by a President, Vice-Presidents, and a Council elected annually. The Reference and Lending Libraries contain a large collection of the best works on Spiritualism and occult subjects. Spiritualist and other newspapers and periodicals from all parts of the world are regularly supplied for the Reading Room, to which Members have access daily.

The Reading Room and Library is open daily from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m., on Saturdays from 10 a.m. to 1 p.m., during which hours books can be exchanged, and enquiries answered. The Rooms are also open on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday Evenings from 7 to 9 o'clock, when a Member of Council or the Hon. Sec. pro tem. will be in attendance to receive visitors and attend to any requirements of members and friends of the Association.

Spiritualists and others visiting the Metropolis are cordially invited to visit the Association and inspect the various objects of interest on view in the Reading Room and Library. Information is cheerfully afforded to inquirers on all questions affecting Spiritualism. Discussion Meetings are held fortnightly during the winter months. Admission free to Members and Subscribers, who can introduce one or more friends to each meeting. Programmes can be obtained on application during the winter season.

Societies, at which all friends are welcome are held at intervals during the season. An admission fee is charged, including refreshments:

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M. A. (Oxon.)"

Two leaders of men have left on record their statement of faith. At a time when reconstruction of belief is in men's minds it may not be amiss to recall to memory what Mazzini and Garibaldi had to say respecting problems that engage our thoughts. Mazzini's creed is elaborated with care, and is worth attention.

I believe in God :

In a providential law, prefixed by Him to life :

A law, not of fall, expiation, and redemption through grace of past or present intermediates between God and man ; but of indefinite progress, founded upon and measured by our own efforts :

In the unity of life ; misconceived by the philosophy of the last two centuries :

In the unity of law ; both as regards the collective and individual manifestation of life :

In the immortality of the Ego ; which is but the application of the law of progress (irrefutably revealed by the combined evidence of historical tradition, the aspirations of the human soul, and the discoveries of science) to the individual manifestations of life :

In free will ; without which responsibility, conscience, and the power of deserving progress, are impossible.

In the association—successive and ever-increasing—of all the human faculties and powers ; as the sole method of progress, at once individual and collective :

In the unity of the human race, and moral equality of all the children of God ; without distinction of sex, colour, or position, and never to be interrupted save by crime :

And therefore :

In the sacred, inexorable, dominant idea of duty, as the one sole rule of life ; duty, embracing for each, according to his sphere and power, alike the family, the fatherland, and humanity ; the family, altar of the fatherland ; the fatherland, sanctuary of humanity ; humanity, portion of the universe and temple erected to God, who creates it that it may gravitate towards Him ; duty, which commands us to promote the progress of others in order to achieve our own, and our own in order to benefit others ; duty, without which no right can exist, and which creates the one pure, sacred and efficacious virtue—Sacrifice ; halo that crowns and sanctifies the human soul.

Finally, I believe, not in the actual dogma, but in a new, great, religious manifestation, founded on the above principles, destined, sooner or later, to proceed from the initiative of a people of freemen and believers—from Rome if she will comprehend her mission—and which, while accepting those portions of truth discovered by anterior religions, shall reveal a new portion; and overthrowing, at its advent, all privilege and caste intolerance, disclose to us the path of future progress.

The liberty of all through the association of all; such is the republican formula.

God and the people are the two sole terms which survive an analysis of the elements accepted by all political schools as the foundation of the social state. Rome well knows the path of self-sacrifice, citizen virtue, and true glory, upon which, led by the banner inscribed by those solemn words in '49, she rekindled all Italy's love and faith in her.

Garibaldi is characteristically vague, and enthusiastic rather than definite. Writing from Caprera on October 7th, 1869, on the eve of the holding of an Anti-papal Council at Naples, he says :—

I belong to the religion of Truth !

I belong to the religion of God !

These two formulas are identical, and, when made universal, they are sure to conduce to the moral unity of the world.

The former is more conformable to the bent of the high intelligence of the free-thinker, because wholly exempt from mysticism.

The latter being more acceptable to the minds of the masses inured to worship, is more practicable.

For truly, from the Greek to the Scandinavian—from the American to the inhabitant of Asia—all people acknowledge a Supreme Being. If we divest that worship from the mystic and the revealed, there will remain the pure religion of God and Truth, around which the human family must naturally gather.

It is amusing to notice how sure Garibaldi was that he knew what truth is, what God is. As he says, he was not a teacher, and his ideas are worthy of note only from the earnestness and enthusiasm of the man. Mazzini was on a far higher intellectual plane, and his expectation, of "a new, great, religious manifestation, which, while accepting those portions of truth discovered by anterior religions, shall reveal a new portion," is at last about to be realised. For the merely destructive phase which was essential while Spiritualism broke up the fallow ground and cleared it of rubbish seems about to give place to an epoch of constructive energy, wherein the new knowledge which has been given during the past half century will be organised and utilised for the satisfaction of the spiritual necessities of those for whom no provision has yet been made. It is a blot that Spiritualists alone, who have penetrated deeper into religious truth than most of their fellows, should be left for spiritual sustenance to the chance ministrations of those who are sufficiently broad in thought and enlightened in perception to have a message for them which is not altogether repellent. It is time that the Spiritualist should have a form of worship of his own that will embody his faith, and satisfy his aspirations. The soul that never worships in communion with others is spiritually starved, except in some few cases which only serve to illustrate the rule that is well-nigh universal. The rest and refreshment, the harmony and unity of purpose ministered by "common prayer and praise" would be a real blessing to those who are in only too great danger of perpetuated discord and disunion. Who shall say how much the divisions, the selfishnesses and accentuated individualities which have always been a note of Spiritualism, might be attuned and toned down by common worship and united prayer? Who shall say in what degree absence of this has starved souls and caused angularity, irritability, and singularity where there should have been unity and harmony of purpose? The soul needs its sustenance as well as the body, and the withholding of it causes the same result in either case.

It may be—I cannot tell—that the days of darkness and discord are not yet fully past. It may be that the time is not yet come for full harmony of purpose among those who have entered into a heritage of liberty which they are all unwilling to fetter. It may be that many Spiritualists are still so full of wonder that they have no place for any other thought; or that some are not content to go back to any semblance of the old theology; or that some find their spiritual sustenance in the Churches, and seek nothing different. But, be this as it may, there are many who long for something that shall nourish their souls, and who do not find it in even the broadest and most liberal exponent of orthodox or unorthodox theology. I believe that the time is coming, if it be not already come, when efforts will be fitly made to organise a Spiritualist church, the ritual and liturgy of which shall be expressive of our faith, and where we can gather together for mutual worship and edification. The publication of "Spirit Teachings" has made me very sensible of this want by the correspondence it has brought me.

I do not now venture to hint at any lines on which this attempt should be made. I do but point out that a profound necessity of our nature is unsatisfied so long as we have no common voice of prayer, praise, and exhortation. It is strange that the various efforts that have been made from time to time to supply this want should not have been more successful. I do not doubt that this has been attributable to the fact that the reign of discord which has cursed the earth so long is not yet past. When the time comes it will be a duty that we shall neglect at our peril to make some serious efforts at an organisation of the nature I have indicated. We shall not find ourselves in perfect harmony, probably, with any single theological system; nor with the opinions of any man, be he ever so sweetly reasonable. But we shall not despise the honest thought of any man who has faced the problems that face us, and has wrestled with them and prevailed. The re-statement in terms of modern thought, in response to present needs, of that old truth which, because it is truth, can never die, is the want of the age. It is absolutely necessary that truth should be re-stated from time to time. Jesus Christ did it for His age, and we have lived upon the spiritual food He gave us ever since. It has been done in other lands by other prophets. It is time that we take a comprehensive view of that truth which is the exclusive property of no sect, no Church, no people, no age, but is manifested variously and according to his needs, to every honest seeker.

We shall find a vast mass of material ready to our hands. The splendid storehouses of devotion and liturgical service that the various branches of the Christian Churches, and especially that which is known as the "Changeless East," nearest now to Primitive Christianity, can furnish to us: the Bibles of various faiths, expressions for many a different age of the revelation of the Supreme; the songs of praise that have given voice to adoration in the churches of the past and still resound among us—these will give us wealth of form and matter into which to infuse the spirit of the new dispensation. In none of them, perhaps, a perfect model; but in all something to admire, to preserve, to adapt, and to restate. A valued friend, writing of other matters, adds some very apposite thoughts, which I venture to make more public than they were meant to be:—"In my various readings lately I have come across some most exquisite things in Ernest de Bunsen's 'Hidden Wisdom,' and in his 'Angel Messiah,' which most beautifully and clearly link together Buddhism and Christianity, historically and esoterically. All the teachings are in a celestial harmony in their interior relationships unquestionably. We do not need contending partisans of either truth to make wider the chasm (of external appearance)—we want a real Pontifex Maximus to build the bridge of Divine Unity across the ages. That great bridge-builder's name is Universal Charity. Each of us, we will hope, may be, by-and-bye, permitted to lay a stone (be it ever so simple) in the bridge-building. I would desire nothing better than to be permitted to work under this Master Builder." I am glad to think that the days of Babel are passing, and that the vexations of Ephraim and Judah are drawing to an end. Verily we have had enough of them.

M.A. (Oxon.)

[It was with a deep feeling of grateful satisfaction that we found our esteemed contributor, "M.A. (Oxon.)," had this week in his "Notes" touched upon a theme which has to our knowledge long been a matter of thoughtful consideration to some of our readers resident in and near London. Not a few have felt the need of a service similar to that alluded to by our friend, there being at present nothing in existence calculated to attract and unite Spiritualists. Even in the most liberal of orthodox churches or "Free Religious Services," there is apparent a coldness and deadness which harmonise little with the warmth and fervour which should arise out of the practical knowledge possessed by Spiritualists. The discussion of the subject at the present time seems to us very opportune, inasmuch as one or two friends, with a view of testing the feeling of Spiritualists in this matter, had recently determined to take counsel with those known to be in sympathy with the idea. We shall therefore be pleased to hear from any of our readers who are interested in the matter, and shall be happy to help and assist in the carrying out of the plan, should it be deemed advisable to attempt it. Letters should be addressed to us at our office, 38, Great Russell-street, London, W.C.—Ed. "LIGHT."]

A VOICE THAT IS STILL.

By H. L. D'Arcy Jaxone.

I.

When ev'ning lights her lamp of gold,
And silver stars pave Heaven's floor,
I dream that one within the fold
Comes back to bless my life once more.
Amid the stilly hush of night
I feel the breath of unseen wings,
And through the far-off gates of light
A long-lost voice above me sings—
"Till the dawning of the day,
Till the shadows die away,
Till we live and love for aye,
I am ever near thee!"

II.

When morning crowns the hills with gold,
And wakes the earth with Heaven's smile,
I know my love hath left the fold,
To stay on earth a little while;
Like bells that chime at eventide
A voice resounds through years of pain,
An unseen spirit by my side,
For ever sings the glad refrain—
"Till the dawning of the day,
Till the shadows die away,
Till we live and love for aye,
I am ever near thee!"

New Song published by J. B. Cramer and Co.

ERRATUM.—In the first note on p. 469 of article on Esoteric Buddhism by Hon. Roden Noel ("LIGHT," October 27th), for "of course or by us perceived geniisms as external are symbols, &c., &c."—read—"of course organisms perceived by us as external are symbols to us of conscious individuals, however rudimentary. But when you come to the inorganic you cannot at all know what conscious individualities this implies—though it must imply some such, &c."

A SCIENTIFIC ORACLE.—Sir W. Thompson, lecturing the other day in Scotland, announced the discovery of a seventh sense—a magnetic one. He proceeded to say: "He in no way supports that wretched, grovelling superstition of animal magnetism, spiritualism, mesmerism, clairvoyance, of which they had heard so much. Clairvoyance, and so on, was the result of bad observation chiefly, somewhat mixed up with the effects of wilful imposture, acting on an innocent and trusting mind." Has not the oracular mind itself got "something mixed up" in the last sentence?

SPIRITUALISM IN CURRENT LITERATURE.

CASSELL'S SATURDAY JOURNAL.

It is very curious to note how Spiritualism crops up at every turn in the current literature of the day, and that in no disguised form. Passing by for the moment many cases which occur to us of articles bearing on the subject which have appeared in the high-priced quarterlies and other magazines, we desire to introduce to the readers of "LIGHT" a sketch which recently appeared in Cassell's Saturday Journal. This weekly is advertised as a popular journal of pure literature and healthy amusement. It is, therefore, a very marked sign when the proprietors introduce undiluted Spiritualism to their readers, as in the case of the following story. The opening sneer goes for nothing.

My Uncle's Spirit—A True Story.

Spiritualism has always appeared to me a craze, and Spiritualists a set of crazy people, or, even worse, a lot of tricksters. Perhaps both are to be found in the ranks, and one set preys on the credulities of the other. For this reason I have always declined to have anything to do with séances or materialised manifestations, and have been a merciless critic of such of my friends as have taken part in them. However, at last I have been fain to acknowledge that there is "something in it," and how this change has come about I now purpose showing.

It was thus. Not very long ago my wife and I were spending an evening at a friend's house, and in the company was a young gentleman who made some pretensions to being a spirit medium. Chaff was freely bestowed upon him, until he finally declared that he could obtain manifestations which we could not deny. The challenge was accepted, and preparations were made for the performance. A moderate-sized but heavy dining-table was selected by him, and, seated round this, we were soon shewn table-turning and lifting, some of it impossible to put down to trickery, but we accounted for the same by ascribing it to electricity or magnetism. When the huge table was elevated some two feet above the floor, and flung upon its side without any apparent agency, then some were convinced, but others, amongst whom I was most prominent, declared that even this was not enough.

"Very well," said the medium, "I shall endeavour to remove your doubts in another way, and we will now have some table-rapping."

He proceeded to explain that this was done in the following manner:—A spirit by name must be asked for, and on his announcing himself by raps on the table, then questions could be asked, and his answers would be given by raps. All questions must be put so that they could be answered by plain "yes" or "no," or by numbers. Three raps to mean "yes"; one rap "no."

Forthwith, accordingly, spirits were called for by various persons, and considerable amusement was created by the consternation of the ladies, when they thought a "spirit from the vasty deep" was so near them. Many of these answers were wonderful. The time of a watch placed under a handkerchief on the table was told in raps, the number of coins in a purse—fortunately they were numerous—was correctly stated, and many other severe tests were applied, in most of which the table was successful. Still disbelieving, I was challenged to call a spirit unknown to any one present, and to ask any question I thought fit. Suddenly remembering an uncle who had died many years before, who had lived many hundreds of miles away from where we then were, and who, so far as I could tell, had never been heard of, much less known, to any one present, I asked for the spirit of Chester Wilde. In a moment or two three raps on the table announced the supposed spirit of my uncle.

"Are you the spirit of Chester Wilde?" I asked.
"Yes," was the immediate reply.
"He who lived at Fromborough, in Southshire?" I persisted.

"Yes."
Then correct answers were given as to the date of his death, how long his wife had remained a widow before she married again, and her present abode, when the matter began to grow exciting. I next proceeded on to deeper waters, relating to a matter that needs some explanation.

The mother of my uncle was granddaughter to a baronet, Sir William Chester, who had died intestate many years before. His estates had been thrown into Chancery, and there remained. She had always declared that her son (my uncle) was the rightful heir, and on her deathbed had given to him a bundle of documents, which she charged him never to part with, as some day these would enable him to regain the title, or at any rate the estates, which she said were his right. Amongst these documents was what purported to be a will made by Sir William Chester.

Many years ago, when a lad of twelve years of age, I, with my mother, was on a visit to this uncle. Some months before that time, he had been informed that a claimant to the estates had come from America, and that if he wished to defend his supposed rights he must take steps at once. He had the seeds of consumption in him, and knew his days were numbered. To this, and the fact of having no children, we put down the unwillingness he evinced to act in the matter. Friends made offers to him of money to press his claims, but he refused them, on the ground that he would not like to risk other people's money in so uncertain an adventure.

At the time of my visit the affair was much talked about. It fired my youthful ambition to have the prospect of a very wealthy uncle, perhaps a baronet, and I accepted the truth of the story without question. In my eyes he was quite a hero, and I almost assumed the airs of the nephew of so great a man. His wife was a proud, ambitious woman, and she fanned my ardour, promising that if they obtained their rights, I was to have a pony and no end of good things.

Within twelve months, however, the whole romance was at an end. Chester Wilde died, the American claimant was declared heir, and the whole affair became in our minds a dream of the past. But I always believed that had he received his just due, my family would have been the owners of a splendid estate, with all its accumulations.

This was the matter upon which I wished to question my uncle's spirit, and in view of what afterwards took place, it must be remembered what was my own belief.

"Were you the rightful heir to the estate of Sir William Chester?" I asked the spirit.

"No," was the, to me, astounding reply.

If this were true, the will and other documents I knew had been in my uncle's possession, must have been forgeries, for they were clear enough. So that I next proceeded upon this hypothesis.

"Were the documents you had forgeries?"

"Yes," was the answer, and the table jumped quite excitedly.

The situation now became a serious one, and I wanted to know who the forger was, so I began with my uncle, intending to go backwards and trace where the guilt lay.

"Did you forge them?" was the next question.

"No," came decidedly and without hesitation.

"Did your mother forge them?"

"Yes," and in the most excited manner the table rapped out this reply.

Astounded I left the table, saying that it evidently told lies, but that it certainly was wonderful what I had heard.

The effect this made upon my mind was very great, and some time afterwards calling upon my mother, who, it will be remembered, was with me on the visit to my uncle some years before, I told her all that had occurred. By then the effect had somewhat passed away, and I laughingly told the story as a very good joke.

"You don't mean to say," she asked, in astonishment, "when I concluded my narrative, 'that the table said the papers were forgeries?'"

"Yes, but what of that?" I replied, noticing that a peculiar expression had come over her countenance.

"They were forgeries," she answered me.

"Forgeries! How do you know that?" I exclaimed. Then she told me the following strange story.

"You remember," she began, "when we were at Fromborough, one evening your aunt talking very boastfully of what she would do when they got their rights, and promising you a pony. That same evening you went down into the town with her to visit some friends, and after you were gone I asked Chester if he expected anything would ever come of the matter. He then brought out all the documents and shewed them to me, finally saying that they were nearly all forgeries, and that his mother had forged them. It appeared that she was a very eccentric sort of woman, one who was thought by many to be touched in her mind. After her death, when these papers came into his possession, he naturally began to examine them, and was astonished to find they were so clear. Something roused his suspicions, however, and on making inquiries of his sister, she told him some things which proved that his mother had forged nearly all the documents, the watermark on the paper proving the same thing. Of course, he thus knew that it would be folly to do anything, and hence his supineness."

"I asked him," continued my mother, "whether his wife knew anything of this, and he then informed me that he had never told her, because she had never got on well with his friends, and to tell her this about his own mother would give her a handle which she would not fail to make use of. Under promise of secrecy I have never said a word about this matter until to-day, and should not now have done so, had it not been for the wonderful result of questioning the table."

I have nothing more to add to this story. Understand it I cannot. No one amongst those who sat around the table knew aught of my uncle, and the theory that the mind of the questioner controls the answers of the table, does not here apply, because these answers were directly against what I believed, and opposed to all I had then heard. However, I cannot condemn Spiritualism as I once could, though I have not seen enough to lead me to believe in it.

"WHO ARE OUR SPIRITUAL ENEMIES?"

A PATCHWORK FROM BÖHME.

I.

"We are to consider how, out of the eternal good, an evil is come to be?"—J. B.'s "Myterium Magnum," Chap. 3, p. 2.

If indeed mystical research is one of the objects which "LIGHT" was intended to promote, ideas drawn from Jacob Böhme, the greatest of European mystics, cannot be out of place in its pages; very much out of favour no doubt they are. The majority of readers cannot care for them; but it is in the minority that pioneers of spiritual progress are generally found, and believing that to such Böhme's teaching is welcome, and that by such some adequate notion of its value will gain larger currency, I venture to plunge once more into a subject that must necessarily be abstruse—the nature of those enemies from which human souls have to be saved. I was going to say desire to be saved; but the characteristic of our time is that that desire is so faint in the majority as to be hardly perceptible. There must be some reason for this which the pulpit phrase "a growing want of faith," hardly suffices to explain. The want is evident enough—its cause in contemporary intellectual life not so easily detected. Torpor of the will, stimulated externally by ever new varieties of allurements, and dulled, as to internal consciousness, by consequent pre-occupation, is of course the main factor of coldness to spiritual interests; but the peculiar anomaly of our day is that often, with a very serious attention to these, there is entire contempt for all that used to act on our ancestors, either as a religious check or incentive—the common attitude of many a highly cultivated mind as to this, being such as we take with regard to machinery that did its work well in the past, but has since been superseded by better inventions.

For example, when it is a question of belief in the Incarnation of the Son of God for the redemption of man, it is not vigorous disbelief that one generally discovers in unbelievers, so much as total indifference. Arguments and evidence miss their aim on minds quite incurious as to proof or disproof. When no need of salvation has been felt or perceived, the fact of a Saviour having come must be wholly uninteresting; and if, setting aside all apprehension as to a future life, it is urged that one came on earth "to save His people from their sins," the proffer is unheeded, not from ignorance of sin, or always from any lack of sincerest longing to be rid of its yoke, but from the conviction of powerful minds that human beings are able to be their own saviours; or in natures of an opposite mould, that sin is a fatality and not evitable.

This, so far as I can understand, is the fashion of modern philosophy, and it holds its ground by virtue of partial truth, famous as an amalgam for the rapid extension of error. Accepting such truth so far as it goes,—that by our own force if we will we can often resist temptation, and that organisations are frequently met with whose escape from sin would be little short of miraculous,—I appeal both to history and to present living consciousness when asking, has sin no greater force than what self-command and self-culture can overpower? Have we verily no enemies worse than ourselves, promoting vice, urging us to evil?

It is very old-fashioned to admit any belief in the Satan of Holy Writ and the powers of darkness, against which it warns; by many people they have been consigned with Luther's devil to the lumber room of history, as obsolete superstitions; and so ignorant are we, for the most part, of the weakness of human nature, that in saying as some do, that they are not afraid of finding any worse enemy than self, they think it an assurance of comparative safety. But if in man's radical being there are realms of potential anguish and unguessed springs of torment, if, indeed, there is nothing in the universe which the soul of man does not comprise and share, what an idle boast it is! And if there are no evil beings alike the accomplices and the avengers of sin, why such terror in evil doers when death comes to shut them out in the unseen world? What do they fear if there are no powers of darkness? The wrath of God! Alas! it is not only belief in a devil that has been dissipated in the crucible of modern thought!

Carlyle said truly, "The effects of optics in this strange camera obscura of existence are most of all singular. The grand centre of the modern revolution of ideas is ever this—we begin to have a notion that all this is the effect of optics, and that the intrinsic fact is very different from our old conception of it." From Böhme I learned what is the difference of the intrinsic fact and our conception of spiritual dangers; and I can see how extremely difficult it would be to rectify mistakes which run on a smooth, well-worn groove of habit, by recondite truths for which a road must be cut out through all oppositions of prejudice and sloth. Still this much must be granted, that hitherto no school of religionists has pretended to meet the root obstacle to religious faith,—the power of evil in a world created by Omnipotent God. It is invariably evaded: reason and philosophy are warned off that ground, and piety tries to fence off any approach to it, as the brink of a tremendous abyss of perplexity, lest there it should be maddened into Atheism.

Böhme challenged his contemporaries on just this point, asking after many other questions, "What do you suppose God's wrath to be? or what is that in man which displeaseth God so much that he tormenteth and afflicteth man so, seeing he hath created him? And that he imputeth sin unto men and condemneth him to eternal punishment? Why hath he created that wherein or wherewith man committeth sin? Surely that thing must be far worse? Wherefore and out of what is that come to be? or what is the cause, or the beginning, or the birth and geniture of God's fierce wrath out of or from which hell and the devil are come to be? Or how comes it that all the creatures in this world do bite, scratch, strike, beat and worry one another, and yet sin is imputed only to man? Out of what are poisonous and venomous beasts and worms, and all manner of vermin come to be?" . . . "Give your direct and fundamental answer to this, and demonstrate what you say."—(Aurora, chap. 22, par. 36.)

No answer has ever been attempted—to the best of my belief—from his time to ours. It has been easier, and it was judged to be safer, to leave such mysteries alone; and as to attending to the one who did give answer to these questions, it was much easier to call him either a dangerous fanatic, or a wild dreamer, than to master one of his books. Only a few, and those of robust intellect, have accepted his teaching, at first as but a theoretic scheme; and at last as revelation that appeased all doubts.

But was it safe to leave these awful mysteries untouched? Did not such careful ignoring of their pressure on the mind cause suspicion that danger to faith lay there? When so many spiritual delusions have been ended by critical analysts of the past, it cannot surprise us that with this terrible excuse for doubt in the unexplained rule of evil (not to speak of any other excuse drawn from the lives of average Christians), reflective people begin to suspect all previous articles of faith of being accommodations to human ignorance. It is thus that every transitional epoch endangers the kernel with the husk.

Now, one often hears it said that all religions must undergo change and modification, as if that truth justified disbelief in the essentials of Christianity; a child when first conscious of the laws of perspective might as wisely say that these prevented his seeing some lofty hill conspicuous from all sides. Human ideas of Deity must expand, and so far alter with growth, but to try and efface the centre of structural life would be the very reverse of evolution; and to ignore a God is quite as much a retrograde movement.

Let me, as well as I can, sum up the few positions in which, apart from Böhme's solution, we must find ourselves when confronting the power of evil in this world. Either we must suppose evil and good to be alike the fortuitous outcome of impersonal will-less forces; or that evil originates in the will of some mighty Being not God, with whom God is in conflict, and so far as we can see in all our past and present here, not victorious; or to use the words of Mr. St. George Stock, "That evil is appointed in the good providence of God for some wise end." Had he said permitted, that statement might be allowed by the mystic, "but," he adds, "if all is to come right in the end, one hardly sees why it should have gone wrong in the beginning." Now, it is precisely that which Böhme helps us to see.

OBSERVATIONS ON MATERIALISATION.

By Dr. Chazaraïn.

Dr. Chazaraïn continues his observations in the current number of Le Spiritisme (Paris):—

"The materialisation of invisible beings constituting a kind of phenomenon, calculated to excite reflection in materialists, my readers will not be surprised at my adducing further instances, occurring under my own observation in the circle of investigation mentioned in my last article.

"At the séance of June 21st, the spirit of Florence Hannecourt came from between the curtains of the temporary cabinet with an infant in her arms, walked directly to a lady in the circle, Madame V. F., and presented it to her! She recognised her infant with emotion, and its little limbs moved in response to her caressing touch.

"The spirit retired with the infant to the cabinet, presently to return with a rose-branch in her hand, which—after gracefully waving it to the circle—she presented to Madame Alice, whose birthday it was, embraced her, and withdrew.

"A male spirit then came forth. He took the quire of paper from the table, reclined upon the floor, laid the paper by his side, and wrote some verses, twenty-two lines, addressed to Madame Alice, and signed 'Maurice.' The verses are marked by poetic feeling and by high literary merit.

"Séance of June 28th. The curtains of the cabinet were drawn aside, revealing a male spirit, whom the circle knew as 'Firmin.' He held above his head a dark lantern—which I had brought, lighted, and placed on the cabinet-table—turning it about to throw its light in all directions. Replacing the lamp, he brought out the musical-box, which had run down, and handed it to one of us to re-wind; taking it back, he placed it, playing, on the floor. He then approached Madame N., who took his offered hand, and led her gracefully to and fro in the space between us and the cabinet, then back to her chair. Taking paper from the table he then reclined upon the floor and wrote. I was a communication in verse, twelve lines, of great beauty, addressed to Mademoiselle Jeanne, and applicable to the state of mind and circumstances of that lady, who was one of the circle.

"Séance of July 5th. Four invited guests were present in the circle to-day, and the consequent change of conditions caused delay in the production of the phenomena. In the end the curtains opened, exhibiting a form clad in white, which advanced in front of the circle; it was the spirit 'Firmin.' Returning to the cabinet, he kept aside one of the curtains with one hand, while with the other he turned the light of the dark lantern upon his countenance, so as to enable us to make out his features in every detail; he then drew apart both curtains, and shewed himself and the medium in her chair at the same time. Coming out, he walked to and fro, touched or shook hands with several, carried the music-box, weighing twenty pounds, on his fingers without apparent effort. Putting this down, he then took a sheet of paper, folded it, and reclining on the floor, wrote various recommendations and counsels. It was afterwards observed by those who had known him that this writing was marked by the same faults of orthography which he had in earthy life. Returning to the cabinet, he brought out the table, laden with its usual articles. Retiring again behind the curtains, we heard sounds as if he were fanning the medium. Then all ceased.

"Our invited guests then verified the facts that the chair on which the medium sat was, as before the séance, nailed to the floor; that the ligatures, preventing the least movement on her part, were undisturbed, and that the figures they had seen differed in every particular from the medium."

PSYCHOLOGY AND POETRY.—Those persons who have made a study of the condition of the Psychic or Sensitive will find in the following stanzas the question in occult wise, suggested whether the lady of the poem is mediumistic or indeed

"MAD"?

"As in the holy garden of the Lord
Guarded by Cherubim with flaming sword
Where I God's beauty ever have adored,
Dwell I within this lovely house alone.
They say that I am mad, because I know
That all around the heavens ebb and flow,
That all about the angels come and go,
And tabernacle here 'neath flesh and bone.

Men said that I was mad because I saw
A Woman glorious her veil withdraw
From off her shining face, and a new law
Unfold in snowy whiteness to mine eyes;
Because she said to me: "Come forth, and be
A handmaid, and a finger unto me,
And I will mother, sister be to thee.
Come forth and speak my word and make men wise."

And on her head there was a diadem.
And oh! the tenderness of her sweet eyes!
They drew me forth from death with strange surprise,
How could I but obey and quickly rise,
And putting off all fear go forth to them
And speak her words,—speaking as one who dreams,
In fiery phrases and in molten streams
Of thoughts unknown to me,—of mighty schemes,
Of God, to perfect and make fair man's soul.
I spoke in fragments, for the mighty whole
Was as a tossing sea with ceaseless roll;
And wandering thus, beside this restless sea,
In every wave a message new of life
Came to mine ear.—And ever in the strife
Of waters rang the words, "O mystic Wife, Wisdom Divine, O Bride, hail, hail to Thee!"

Though rarely now I see a human face;
When evening sunshine floods the galleries old,
The music-room and cinnamon-room with gold,
Sweet converse with me throngs of spirits hold.
Odours celestial spread through every place,
Whilst pictured thought-clouds roll themselves around,
And trailing rainbow-vestment fans the ground.
Of new-born poets bay and myrtle crowned,
Then have I glimpses—the supernal race!

Alone! alone! yet am I not alone!
My thoughts are messengers to human-kind;
Ambassadors of spirit from the mind,
Sent forth to other minds to knit and bind;
Yet oft for others' sin must I atone.
The walls of flesh dissolve and I can flow
Into the core of human hearts and know
How loves and hatreds blossom, bud, and grow,
To them unknown, I with them make my moan.

APPARITION OF A DOG SEEN BY TWO SISTERS.

In the course of last summer I met Miss Temple, sister of the Bishop of Exeter, at my daughter's house. She told me that five or six years ago, a lady, since dead, a common friend of hers and mine, was visiting her, when the conversation turning upon ghosts, she said: "Would you believe me if I told you I had seen the ghost of a dog?" Miss Temple replied, "Never mind whether I should believe you or not; tell me your story." The lady then told her that she and her sister had had a favourite dog whose habit was to scratch at the door at night, and being let in, to jump up and sleep on the bed. The dog died, and about a fortnight afterwards she was awake by a scratching at her bedroom door. She got up and saw, as it seemed to her (not thinking at the moment of her dog's death), the dog at her sister's door, which was on the opposite side of a landing. The dog went in and she returned to bed. In the morning her sister told her that such a curious thing had happened; that she had awoke in the night; had heard scratching at the door. She opened the door, saw Beppo there. He ran past her, jumped on the bed and then disappeared. On hearing the above from Miss Temple, I wrote to the surviving sister telling her that I had heard a story of her and her sister, which practically amounted to their having seen the apparition of a dog. In her answer to me she says: "I remember hearing the dog cry outside my bedroom door, and jumping up to let him in at the same time that my sister did so from her room, and also waking early one summer morning and seeing the little fellow lying asleep on his red cushion by the rug." I afterwards wrote her the details I had heard from Miss Temple, and in her reply she says: "It was in that room that I saw and heard the dog after his death. When I wrote to you I had not received your second note containing the details of the story, but I see that my recollections correspond with my sister's, except that I do not now remember the dog running past me into my room."

Among the evidence collected by the Society for Psychical Research there is a thoroughly vouched story of a horse, which, having carried his master on a visit to a friend's house, died of heart disease in the night. In the middle of the night his master was roused from sleep by hearing the steps of a horse tramping on the stairs. He got up, and finding nothing, returned to bed, only to be shortly roused again by the same mysterious sounds. He then went to his friend's room, and as they both distinctly heard the tramping on the stairs, they searched the house thoroughly, and then proceeded to the stables, when they found the body of the horse dead in his stall. They both believed that the spirit of the horse had entered the house and manifested to the inmates there, as the spirit of a man is so often known, on the termination of his earthly life, to visit any of his surviving friends to whom he may be specially attached.

STRANGE STORY OF A CAT SEEING A SPIRIT.

It was during the winter of 18— that one evening I was sitting by the side of a cheerful fire in my bedroom, in an old château in France, busily engaged in caressing a favourite cat—the illustrious Lady Catherine. She lay in a feline attitude and a winking state of drowsiness in my lap. The room was perfectly illuminated by the light of the fire. There were two doors—one behind me, leading into an apartment which had been locked for the winter, and another on the opposite side of the room, which communicated with the passage. Mamma had not left me many minutes, and the high-backed, old fashioned arm-chair, which she had occupied, remained vacant at the opposite corner of the fire-place. Puss, who lay with her head on my arm, became more and more sleepy, and I pondered on the propriety of preparing for bed. On a sudden I became aware that something had affected my pet's equanimity. The purring ceased and she exhibited rapidly increasing symptoms of uneasiness. I bent down and endeavoured to coax her into quietness, but she instantly struggled to her feet in my lap, and spitting vehemently, with back arched and tail swollen, she assumed a mingled attitude of terror and defiance. The change in her position obliged me to raise my head, and on looking up to my inexpressible horror I then perceived that a little hideous old hag occupied mamma's chair. Her hands were rested on her knees, and her body was stooped forward so as to bring her face in close proximity with mine. Her eyes, piercingly fierce and shining with an ever-piercing lustre, were steadfastly fixed on me. It was as if a fiend were glaring at me through them. Her dress and general appearance denoted her to belong to the French bourgeoisie, but those eyes, so wonderfully large, and in their expression so intensely wicked, entirely absorbed my senses, and precluded any attention to detail. I should have screamed, but my breath was gone; whilst that terrible gaze so horribly fascinated me, I could neither withdraw my eyes nor rise from my seat. I had meanwhile been trying to keep a tight hold of the cat, but she seemed resolutely determined not to remain in such an ugly neighbourhood, and after some more desperate efforts at length succeeded in escaping from my grasp. Leaping over tables, chairs, and all that came in her way, she repeatedly threw herself with frightful violence against the top panel of the door which communicated with the disused room. Then returning in the same frantic manner she furiously dashed against the door on the opposite side. My terror was divided, and I looked in turns, now at the old woman, whose great staring eyes were constantly fixed on me, and now at the cat, who was becoming every instant more frantic. At last the dreadful idea that the animal had gone mad had the effect of restoring my breath, and I screamed loudly. Mamma ran in immediately, and the cat, on the door opening, literally sprang over her head, and for upwards of half an hour ran up and down stairs as if pursued. I turned to point to the object of my terror, it was gone. Under such circumstances the lapse of time is difficult to appreciate, but I should think that the apparition lasted about four or five minutes. Some time afterwards it transpired that a former proprietor of the house, a woman, had hanged herself in that very room.—"Man and Beast," Vol. II., p. 340, by the Rev. J. G. Wood.

MESMERISM AND CLAIRVOYANCE.

By H. T. Humphreys.

It is now rather more than thirty years since my attention was turned to Mesmerism, and at that time I devoted some leisure time to experimenting. Seeing that you have recently given several accounts of experiences similar to some that I have had, a brief account of some of my experiments may prove of interest by adding to the stock of evidence which is being now accumulated by the Psychical Research Society.

G. W. Stone paid a visit to Waterford, and having witnessed his performances called biological, I was much interested, especially as some of those on whom he operated were acquaintances of my own. I sat on his platform staring at his disc for some evenings, and at length on one evening I found myself unable to open my eyes. No sensation accompanied this incapacity. I simply found that I could not do it, though in every other respect I felt that I was in my normal condition. I went to him and paid him two guineas to learn what was, indeed, no secret. But I have never regretted the expenditure, for it led me to devote some further attention to the subject; and, at a later period, to my entering on its more advanced branch, Spiritualism.

I was at the time engaged in business, and I began by trying experiments on some of the men in my employment, among whom I speedily discovered susceptible subjects. I took two of these by Stone's request into Waterford one evening; and I think it probable that the Earl of Huntingdon, then a boy, will remember the occasion when these two men were such a feature of the evening's performance. I recollect that one of them delivered a speech, believing himself to be Father Matthew; and that they both afterwards were despatched to pick up gold in California, of which they filled an imaginary sack, the loss of which troubled one of them next day; and he came to me to ask me to go with him to the Mayor of Waterford to endeavour to find out who had stolen it.

The other of these men complained to me that he was burnt by the streams of fire (a purely spontaneous term of his own) which came from Stone, crossing those which came from my hands and eyes, which latter he had always found pleasant to him. He was a very sensitive subject, and taking him into a perfectly dark room I uncovered a magnet, from which he declared that he saw fire proceeding like a luminous pyramid.

On one occasion he came to me, and shewed me his hands, which were considerably swollen and much inflamed. I put him to sleep, which I could do in less than three minutes, and asked him what I should do. "Oh," he said, "it all came from a fog in my side. Don't you remember I told you I had a pain there, and you took it away? But you didn't take away the fog and it has come into my hands." When describing a pustule, or inflammation, he always, when in mesmeric sleep, spoke of such matters as fogs. He went on to tell me to make passes down his arms and this would cure him. I did so, and in less than five minutes was surprised to see that the inflammation and the swelling were completely gone. I then asked him how long his sleep would last, and he said for three minutes longer. At the expiration of that time he awoke and was astonished and delighted to see and feel his hands restored to their normal condition, for he had previously been unable to close them or to open them out fully. Next day he came to me, and shewed me that a number of small pustules had broken out on the back of his hands. I then gave him some mesmerised water, and it was not till some thirty-six hours later that I again saw him, but by that time all the pustules had completely healed.

This case was published in the Zoist.

At another time I had this man on the top of some stairs, and asked him if he were thirsty. He replied in the affirmative, and I handed him a mug of water which I had previously mesmerised unknown to him. As soon as he had drunk it he was falling downstairs asleep, and I was obliged to wake him to prevent this.

One evening I had put him to sleep, and I asked him if he could go anywhere. He said, "Yes," and I took him, by directing him along a road, to the house of a friend of mine some five miles off. Directing him into the kitchen by the back door, I asked who was there. "Oh," said he, "there's Mary Doyle" (a girl from the neighbourhood, who was servant in the house). By this, I knew that he was in the right house. I told him to go upstairs and tell me who was there. He described accurately those whom I thought would be there, but he described a lad who, as I thought, could not be there, and he described a young lady as having a queer head-dress, which came down and covered the lower part of the face. Next day I met the lady of this house, who told me that on the previous evening her son had come home from school, and that one of the young ladies had been suffering from severe toothache during the evening.

On another occasion I asked him to visit in the same way an old gentleman, whom I had been endeavouring (unsuccessfully) to mesmerise, to relieve, if possible, his sufferings from sciatica. "Oh," he said, "he is very bad. He'll never be better. If you could mesmerise him, it would do him good. It all came from a fog in his head." This gentleman told me that his illness was traceable to a rash which had broken out on his forehead, and had been injudiciously driven in by the use of an ointment.

A man who was in my employment became unwell, and suddenly lost the use of his left arm. He saw a skilful physician, who, however, could not do him much good. He was in bed, and I went to him and mesmerised the arm. He recovered the use of the limb, but after my departure the numbness returned. Next day I mesmerised the arm again and the numbness returned afterwards from the elbow only. I then, on the next day, mesmerised him generally and could not put him to sleep, but the numbness departed, and from that time he was able to use his arm as well as ever. This occurred twenty-five years since. I saw him about a year ago, and he informed me that he had never had a return of the numbness in the arm.

I have had several experiences of curing headache; and on one occasion I took a young lady's headache from her and carried it with me some four miles of my walk homeward. Then I got tired of waiting for it to leave me, and I dismissed it by my will. I remember also curing a young lady of a headache, though she had no faith in my having any such power. She then joined the party in the drawing-room, and some time later I told her that her headache was returning, which she admitted, and I again cured her of it.

I gave up mesmeric investigation, save for curative purposes, after a few months' study, as I came to the conclusion that it was not allowable, even in the pursuit of knowledge, to meddle with an organism so delicate as our nervous system.

I may also mention that once, when the family were seated at supper, I, who was not taking supper, thought of an experiment, and standing behind my mother's chair, began to mesmerise her arm then affected with rheumatism. After some time, she, totally ignorant of what I had been doing, said that her arm felt much better.

I have given above a few facts to which I can bear clear testimony.

WHAT OUR CONTEMPORARIES SAY. Organisation amongst Spiritualists.

The Religio-Philosophical Journal says:—Spiritualism is now represented by a mob, where there should be a Grand Army of the Republic of Truth. Shall Spiritualists stand in the world's eye as only a considerable number of mere grumblers at things they don't like, or as men and women who have a distinct purpose, a clear conception of what needs to be done, and resolution to do it? Banded together, the weakest gathers strength from union with the strong. When the Ambassador sent by Frederic the Great to the English Court complained that he could not make as much display as the other Ambassadors, and so was likely to be despised, Frederic grimly answered: "They will not see you, but my army, and your words will be prophetic of the thunder of my guns." This illustration brings up the dread some feel of this very power resulting from organisation. They begin the regulation drone of "creedal bonds," "hierarchy," "new sect," "individuality." Is it impossible to make organisations that shall have for their creed love to man, in all relations, and for ritual only selected ways of manifesting it? Creeds will not be abolished; indeed, the effort would be folly, but they would cease to be binding on any but those who had formed or chosen them. Hierarchy? Yes, the man who worked most would be most honoured, no matter who protested against it. Individuality? This, urged as an objection, is really a strong argument in favour of a large organisation; for only so, can each find a place to do that he or she is best fitted for, only so can individuality have best opportunity to display itself. There is not space to elaborate this point. The short statement of the whole problem is—there is evil to be replaced by good; there are errors and wrongs to be fought against. Shall we do this singly, till our impotency is so demonstrated as to win the contempt of the world, our own included, till in very disgust we cease effort? or shall we combine to destroy the wrong and uphold the right—shall we be a mob or an army?

Esoteric Buddhism.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I trust you will permit me to reply to Madame Blavatsky and her 500 Hindu brothers, and to her accusations of "dishonourable and traitorous conduct" on my part towards my Theosophic friends in the East.

She says that when I joined the Society "I solemnly promised to defend the honour of brother Theosophists when unjustly assailed." Certainly I did, but in the present instance no man's honour has been assailed, and I simply ridiculed the pretensions of a published book, which claimed to teach for the first time to the Western world Divine knowledge, but which seemed to me to be simply a grotesque description of a phantom, most illogically called Esoteric Buddhism. Again, Madame Blavatsky says that it was dishonourable in me to publish the private teachings of my Guru, but these teachings were simply explanations again of a published book, open to all the world, and these private teachings were only,—1st, that the seventh rounder had probably lived in various re-incarnations seventy millions of years without the slightest remembrance of one moment of all that time. 2nd, That the human will was only transcendental matter in motion. 3rd, That the moon was the dust-bin of our solar system. These are three very remarkable statements, and as my teacher did not ask me to conceal his teachings, but only his name, which I have religiously done, why should it be dishonourable in me to publish them?

Again, my critics say that my review of Esoteric Buddhism shews me to be grossly ignorant of Esoteric science, and to have a bad heart and a blasphemous disposition; but surely my simple and credulous Hindu brothers and sisters should not use such strong language without proof, and I repeat that my review of Esoteric Buddhism did not contain one single statement not to be found in the book itself or in the statements of its exponents. And I must therefore conclude that my good friends in the East are under a hallucination as to my real character.

But if I am so stupid and wicked as my critics say I am, how comes it that for three years I was permitted to remain President of the British Branch of the Theosophical Society, and was always spoken of in the pages of the Theosophist as "our esteemed and learned brother," while the Theosophist, in reviewing my book on Theosophy, uses these words:—"Dr. Wyld's book contains a series of thoughtful, scholarly, and interesting papers, the moral tone is stimulating and inspiring; force, learning, and sincerity are his characteristics." How comes it, then, that so thoughtful, learned, esteemed, and sincere a brother should have become all at once so ignorant and false?

My old friend, Madame Blavatsky, would explain it all by the chagrin I experienced on being refused a sight of Koot Hoomi's portrait, as drawn, I am told, by herself; and by the fact that my overtures to open a correspondence with Colonel Olcott's Guru were declined!

Now as to Koot Hoomi's portrait two Theosophists who were permitted to inspect it reported unfavourably to me. Had it been a photograph it might have revealed something, but an imaginary sketch of a supposititious individual could scarcely be of much use to the physiognomist.

As to my overtures to open a correspondence with the wise men of the East direct, and these overtures being rejected, the history of the matter is as follows—which history I should not have divulged, had it not been that Madame Blavatsky has herself opened the secrets of the prison house and let out the ghosts.

Being anxious to get my occult teaching direct from the wise men instead of receiving it filtered through the most untheosophic mind of the priestess, I was told there was no objection—and that I should write to Mr. A., who was not only deeply learned in occult lore, but who was besides "a perfectly holy man." Accordingly I wrote to Mr. A. and received in reply a very courteous letter, but one which revealed no philosophy beyond that of good sense.

Let the reader, then, judge of my surprise when a few months later I received a letter from headquarters denouncing Mr. A. as an impostor and thief, and threatening me with the wrath of the gods if I had any further communication with him!

Again, after a time, I was informed I could write to Mr. B., who was "almost Divine in his knowledge, wisdom, power, and holiness."

I accordingly wrote very humbly to this demi-god, but receiving no reply I concluded that as he knew no English he could neither read my letter nor reply to it, and that most probably he never saw it.

About a year after this transaction I wrote to headquarters and asked if there was any news of Mr. B., and the reply was: Mr. B. has gone all wrong, and having become tyrannical, he is rapidly "disintegrating," and becoming rotten, and must no doubt shortly die out altogether! Alas, how are the mighty fallen, and the fine gold become dim.

However, Mr. B. took quite a different view of the case, and publicly and in print denounced the so-called Theosophists as ignorant pretenders and Atheists, and warned all his Vedantic followers to shun them as perverters of the truth.

In the face of these two catastrophes may one not ask if Mr. A. thus became an impostor and Mr. B. little better than carrion, what assurance can we have that Unknown X may not one day explode into unknown space?

It gives great offence that I say, "Secrecy and Cunning are ever twin sisters and it is childish and effeminate to pretend by secret words and signs to enshrine great truths behind a veil which is only useful as a concealment of ignorance and nakedness."

Notwithstanding the offence these words give, I must maintain them, and now add that the proverbial characteristic secrecy of the Hindu mind receives a striking confirmation in the fact that Koot Hoomi hides himself so effectually that he cannot be found even by his most abject worshipper and chosen commentator, and if Mr. Kiddle's startling announcement is not explained, then "the twin sister Cunning" is presented to us also.

Secrecy has a great charm for many minds, and if Koot Hoomi exists as a person, no doubt he wisely hides himself, for were he seen in the flesh the glamour which he now throws over his worshippers would at once vanish.

But my critic justifies secrecy by quoting the words of Jesus when He says, "Unto you is given the mystery of the Kingdom of God, but unto them that are without all things are done in parables." (Mark iv. 11, 12. Revised Version.)

Undoubtedly so. That is, to those who loved Him, Jesus revealed the Kingdom of God, but those who loved Him not were incapable of receiving the revelation.

Now what possible parallel is here to the pretended secrets of those who hold each other by the thumb in a secret manner, which I shall not explain, while they utter a jargon which I shall not repeat, and who, instead of receiving the kingdom of Heaven as the reward of the ceremony, receive chiefly three sayings: 1st, There is no God. 2nd, You are re-incarnated for seventy millions of years, without a moment's memory of the facts. 3rd, If you do not believe these things you run the risk of being sent to the moon, where "without doubt you shall perish everlastingly."

Surely such important facts might be revealed without holding each other by the chief digit, unless indeed there be truth in the witches of Macbeth when they say, "By the pricking of my thumbs something wicked this way comes."

As to Dr. Macgregor Roy's friend, Chudar Sol,* who so graphically describes Hindu Theosophy, my critic is amusingly on the wrong scent, as that good man is the reverse of a Roman Catholic, and he has never been in Paris.

Madame Blavatsky has never missed an opportunity of ridiculing the historic Jesus, but I have always spoken and written with reverence of Gautama. Had she satirised an anonymous writer who ignorantly abused Buddhism, I should have applauded her work; why then should she and others denounce me for analysing in a satirical vein the teachings of an anonymous Hindu, who not only denounces Christianity, of which he knows nothing, but would substitute in its place a fantastic materialism?

In conclusion, I beg permission to thank Mr. Roden Noel for his superbly logical analysis of "Esoteric Buddhism" in last week's "LIGHT."

G. W., M.D.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—If, as Mr. Ditson alleges, I did not recognise his true attitude towards Mr. Sinnett's books, the fault was certainly not mine. It was because I could discover under his former remarks only a cynicism, far removed from the fairer spirit of his second letter, that my protest was not delicately couched. I am glad that he disowns those "quibbles and jokes;" and now that he passes into "sober criticism," I sincerely hope he may go yet further towards an acceptance of Esoteric Buddhism, and its far-reaching verities.

If I read him rightly, Mr. Ditson now approves of the reasonableness of my statement, "that this spiritual knowledge, exact and experimental as it is, cannot be proved upon paper or tested in the laboratory;" for he says it is "in harmony with the New Testament record." But still the old cry comes from him, "Where is the proof?" Ask the Astronomer Royal for the proof of the law of gravitation, and unless you are mathematically qualified to receive it, he cannot impart it; for though "gravitation" is in harmony with our daily experience, perhaps not twenty people in England know it to be a law of the universe, as did Newton. As far as we see, it holds true—that is all.

So with Occultism. As a system of thought it is incomparable; as a working hypothesis we feel it invaluable; it satisfies, and therefore we turn to the East. But we do not experimentally know the number of incarnations in a round, nor the fact of the solar pralaya, nor all the details of man's septenary constitution. Until we do, we are not so childish as to think we can "puzzle" our teachers, or enlighten ourselves by asking for a proof, which, in the nature of things, we cannot have.

It may be, as Mr. Ditson says, "no difficult matter" to become "saviours of ourselves." I do not know. I spoke of "salvation from ourselves"; a vastly different process, if Mr. Ditson is right as to the former.

"The enemies which rise within the body,
Hard to be overcome,—the evil passions—
Should manfully be fought. Who conquers these

Exoteric Christianity v. Exoteric Buddhism.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—With all respect for Mr. Humphreys, I submit that he has entirely missed the point of my argument. This was that while the Christianity professed by the world, and embodied in the creeds of its principal Churches, is an utter perversion of the mystical truth inculcated by the Founder, and has resulted in a doctrine which is a dangerous spiritual and even moral narcotic, popular Buddhism, on the other hand, though falling far short of the sublime teaching of its Master, does not pervert it, but on the lower plane of popular comprehension enforces principles of universal charity by the strongest personal inducements, and has a history consistent with those principles. We find a great fact in the world which calls itself the Christian religion, which claims infinite superiority over all other religions, and makes faith in its cardinal doctrine the only way to salvation. Almost its whole historical record is one of bigotry, cruelty, and intolerance. We naturally ask how this can be, if the principles of the religion are Divine. And the explanation comes to this, that Christianity is no fact for the world at all, but is merely the religion of the comparatively few and scattered mystics who can apprehend the true teaching of Christ. Very well, then: we are talking of two different things. I am not now concerned with the true teaching, but with the potent agency in the world which calls itself Christianity. It is this which I am characterising, and contrasting with Buddhism as another great agency. And why should Mr. Humphreys and other true believers stand between the false pretence and its indictment? Only on this ground, as I conceive. They cannot forego for their Master the prestige of the great material success which has been won for a most unspiritual doctrine by the false assumption of His authority.

Having been once a little boy in a lower form of a public school, I was not ignorant of the Latin derivation of the word "damnation," or of the right translation. But condemnation to what? If we are baptised we are to be "saved." Then comes the antithesis, which clearly implies that the "condemnation" is the reverse of "salvation." And what is this but the theological "damnation"?

Concerning Organisation.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Attention has been called to the remarks of "M. A. (Oxon.)," in your issue of September 22nd, touching upon the expediency or possibility of organising Spiritualists into a practical co-operative body of humanity, for the promotion of good in the world.

While entirely disposed to treat with due respect the well-known sterling character, experience, ability, and candour of your learned correspondent, we cannot unite with the general drift of his remarks, or their complete applicability to the condition of Spiritualists in this country (U.S.A.).

In the abstract, it would seem to us, if there is good in Spiritualism, that the very statement of the proposition to organise or not to organise, should be sufficient for every practical mind to decide it at once, a priori, in the affirmative.

Your correspondent, surely, does not suppose—intelligent Spiritualists, surely, do not believe—that this age of mankind is the first to have received influxes of thought and knowledge from the spirit-world, by the method of "permeation" or otherwise. By what logic of thought or experience, then, is it proper to argue, that the influxes by which we are affected in so marked a manner, shall not eventuate in practical good, through the same methods whereby man has always realised his growth and advancement in the welfare of body, mind, and spirit?

So much for the first abstract view, thus very briefly stated, and that could be indefinitely enlarged upon.

We might as well, in our foolish dread of creed or individual restraint, throw away all the organised powers of civilised society, and enter at once into the anarchy that would surely result from unrestrained license, "permeated" by both the true and the false,—both the good and the evil influxes from the spirit-world, as to refrain, on account of such fear, from intelligent efforts, through combination, to purify and render available, for the benefit of the race, the noble lessons that we have through growth been able to receive.

It has been claimed that good resulted to the world from organisations, based upon former influxes from the realm of spirits, even though they, in almost every instance, became formulated into fixed creeds and dogmas.

If, then, these revelations of the past could yield their modicum of benefit, how hopeful may we be who are ready to unite our efforts upon the broad basis that "eternal progress is the birthright of the human spirit," and to incorporate into our platform the right to revise and amend our declared principles.

Is "M. A. (Oxon.)," historically and literally correct in stating that "It was not till centuries had passed away, that the teachings of Christ were crystallised, and His followers organised into a Church?"

In the Acts and Epistles of the Apostles, Peter, Paul, &c., that were hardly written "centuries" after the time of Jesus, frequent mention of the organisation of churches is found. But even if correct, such a statement would appear of little moment. The world moves faster in these days, and if we make not proper use of the facilities now at hand, we are simply not doing our duty to the age we live in.

He says, (reciting the Christian Organisation), "It will apparently be long before this latest attempt to renovate and guide human thought, is similarly embodied in an organisation that can act successfully as the medium of its spirit influence."

He further says, speaking of the action of spirit, "Its potency is evident." Let us not be deceived as to this "potency" of spirit influence; for herein rests a matter of deep philosophy, as old as the race and fully confirmed by human experience.

Spirit friends may aid, incite, advise; but we have our own salvation to work out in the practical application of these modern influxes, as well as in every other line of growth.

Whether it will be a long or a short time that the world will have to wait for its share of the salvation that will ensue from the proper digestion and application of the grand truths bursting upon this generation, will depend largely upon the immediate, active, unselfish and efficient co-operative action of its people.

There is some truth in the old writing "God's Spirit will not always strive with man"! We now have enough of truth for the time being, if we will only use it rightly; and this can only be done through organisations for assisting its promulgation and enhancing its practical efficiency.

Fear not! nor become birds of ill omen, because a few previous efforts have failed,—one of them (perhaps the most marked) because it was an attempt to tie to our angel of spirituality the putrid form of free loveism.

The time is ripe now, and earnest, self-sacrificing efforts will succeed.

Let our motto be "Try! try! try! again!"

This "permeation" business is, after all, but a "putting of new wine into old bottles." Should it not burst them, it may for a time add new life and ferment to obsolete creed and dogma; but newer, more rational and expansive organisations can alone guarantee the preservation of the true wine of Truth's coming kingdom.

Perceiving clearly the danger of unyielding creeds, and that the ne plus ultra of the human spirit is never reached; seeing how often in the past simple and saving truth has been corrupted, and has become an engine of oppression, we are all the more intelligently able to feel our way towards realising in fullest possible measure, the benefits of our freshly rising sun of righteousness.

"Astrology."

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I was interested in the letter of your correspondent, "C. C. M.," on "Astrology," because I have been recently earnestly studying the subject with an object similar to his, viz., to judge it by its own facts and not by preconceived opinions. We should condemn nothing, just as we should accept nothing—a priori. Setting myself to master the first principles of the science, I have with regard to these come to very much the same conclusions as "C. C. M.," viz., that the cases that correspond with the main principles come by law rather than by coincidence. But my object in writing is to suggest another class of cases which presents a greater chance of accurate and exhaustive treatment, viz., the cases of Royalties, Princes and Princesses—to show whether their high rank is marked by their natures.

The hours of births of these are more readily and accurately determined, and are beyond dispute.

Now the experience of the students of this science in past ages has laid down the following canons on this point, that a person of exalted station is marked out by a large concurrence of the following testimonies:—

1. The Benefics, Jupiter and Venus, and the Lights, the Sun and Moon, culminating in Midheaven, or rising on the Ascendant, or, at any rate, Orient between these two.
2. The culmination even of the Malefics, Saturn and Uranus (but this generally signifies elevation for a greater fall).
3. The exaltation and dignity of the planet ruling the Ascendant.
4. The exaltation and dignities of the majority of the planets, especially the Benefics, the fact of their being above ground and aspecting one another well and not retrograde.
5. The presence of Benefics in the House of Wealth and in the Cardinal Angles.

With a view of testing these rules, I have begun to collect cases of all whose hour of birth I can verify. Being unfortunately at a distance from a library where I can hunt up old records, my list at present is rather scanty, consisting of eighteen cases. I append the results of these, leaving none out:—

GEORGE III. Jupiter in Midheaven. Sun and Venus Orient. The ruler of the Ascendant and House of Wealth Orient. Six planets above ground—one retrograde, three dignified. Venus and Jupiter Sextile.

GEORGE IV. Venus on Ascendant. Sun Orient. Rulers of Ascendant and House of Wealth Orient. Jupiter and Moon conjoint. Seven planets above ground—one retrograde.

QUEEN CAROLINE. Jupiter on Ascendant. Venus and Sun in Midheaven. Moon Orient. Rulers of Ascendant and House of Wealth in Midheaven. Eight planets above ground—one retrograde.

PRINCESS CHARLOTTE. Jupiter and Venus conjoint on Ascendant. Moon in Midheaven. Sun Orient. Seven planets above ground—two retrograde.

QUEEN VICTORIA. Sun and Moon conjoint on Ascendant. Jupiter in Midheaven. Venus Orient. Ruler of Ascendant and House of Wealth Orient. Eight planets above ground—one retrograde.

H.R.H. PRINCE OF WALES. Jupiter on Ascendant. Sun in Midheaven. Ruler of Ascendant Orient and dignified. Five planets above ground, three dignified—two retrograde. House of Wealth rather afflicted.

H.R.H. THE PRINCESS ROYAL. Venus in Midheaven. The Sun and Jupiter (Ruler of Ascendant) conjoint. The Ruler of House of Wealth in Midheaven. Seven planets above ground, one retrograde.

H.R.H. THE DUKE OF EDINBURGH. The Sun and Venus Orient, the latter Midheaven. The Ruler of the Ascendant and the House of Wealth Orient. Seven planets above ground. Jupiter in the House of Marriage.

H.R.H. THE DUKE OF ALBANY. Saturn and Uranus in midheaven. Venus, Moon and Sun conjoint. A Satellitium of five planets in the House of Art, Learning and Religion. Seven planets above ground—one retrograde.

INFANT DAUGHTER OF THE DUKE OF ALBANY. Jupiter exactly in Midheaven. Moon in House of Wealth trine to Jupiter. Three planets above ground—one retrograde, three angular.

H.R.H. THE PRINCESS BEATRICE. Venus and Uranus in Midheaven. The Sun, Jupiter, and Ruler of Ascendant conjoint. Seven planets above ground, three angular—none retrograde.

NAPOLEON I. Saturn and the Sun in Midheaven. Venus just past Midheaven. Jupiter in House of Wealth. Moon angular. Six planets above ground—none retrograde. Sun Orient and dignified.

LOUIS PHILIPPE. Venus on Ascendant conjoint with the Lord of the Ascendant. Saturn in Midheaven. The Sun Orient. Seven planets above ground—two retrograde.

NAPOLEON III. Saturn (ruler of the Ascendant) in Midheaven. Venus and Jupiter in House of Wealth. Moon between Ascendant and House of Wealth. Two planets above ground—two retrograde. Sun sextile to Moon, Jupiter sextile Ascendant.

THE LATE PRINCE IMPERIAL. Venus between Ascendant and House of Wealth. Jupiter and Sun in House of Wealth. Moon angular. Two planets above ground—one retrograde. (Houses of long Journeys and end of life afflicted by Mars and Uranus.)

THE LATE CZAR, ALEX. II., OF RUSSIA. Sun (Ruler of Ascendant and House of Wealth) in Midheaven. Venus Orient. Six planets above ground—none retrograde.

KING ALFONSO OF SPAIN. Jupiter and Uranus in Midheaven. Moon just past Midheaven. Venus and Jupiter angular. Four planets above earth—three retrograde.

INFANT PRINCESS OF CROWN PRINCE OF AUSTRIA-HUNGARY (nata September, 1883). Moon and Uranus on Ascendant. Jupiter in Midheaven. Venus (ruler of House of Wealth) conjoint with Sun—both Orient. Seven planets above ground—one retrograde.

The other Royalties and Princes are omitted simply because I have not yet obtained the hours of their birth.

Without drawing any generalisations from the above scanty data, I wish simply to draw the attention of other observers to the scientific consideration of the question, and to ask them to contribute the testimonies of other natures bearing on the subject, if the editor will kindly allow the space. In this way we shall gradually be able to arrive at a fairly exhaustive list, enough to balance considerations, and to come to some conclusion.

In giving weight to our different specimens, we must consider the comparative chances of the above testimonies to occur.

Anyone who has the slightest acquaintance with the usual run of natures will know how rarely even one or two of the above testimonies are found in those of ordinary persons.

From the thirty natures which I have at present taken of my immediate friends, who are fair specimens of persons in ordinary station, I gather the following statistics, that not more than eleven out of the thirty have even one of the Benefics or lights, situated on the Ascendant or Midheaven; not more than ten have five or more planets above ground, and only one has any noteworthy concurrence of testimonies, and that one is of a lady who has large wealth and married a gentleman of title.

Exceptions either of persons with a concurrence of good testimonies, living in obscurity, or of indifferent ones, living in a high station, will have to be carefully considered. At present, I have not come across any fair exceptions. The nearest approach in the above list, viz., Napoleon III. and the Prince Imperial, seem to be exceptions that prove the rule. Some may consider the Duke of Albany an exception. Let us hope his after life will not go to prove the rule.

One remark as to "C. C. M.'s" method regarding the insane. Would it not be fairer, if he excludes the affliction of the Moon, to exclude the cases of lunacy where the cerebellum and back part of the brain are diseased. For I think he will find the rational science of Astrology to lay down that the Moon rules the automatic, and, perhaps, some of the propulsive parts of the brain, and Mercury simply the perceptive associative and discriminating.

Another class of cases which may be useful for observation are those of marriages whether early, late, or not at all. The established canons on these points are not very clear, but such as they are, they may be easily tested.

The facts which I have given above will, perhaps, suffice to show that there may be something of a science in Astrology, and induce the prejudiced to give it an examination. Some great minds in the past have examined it and professed not to find it wanting. It came into disrepute because the mass of people were not educated enough to examine it for themselves, and, therefore, it fell into the hands of quacks.

The planets, let it be also remembered, because they synchronise with, or precede certain events, need not necessarily be the causes of them. They may be simply the markers of times. If the universe be, as experience tends to show, a congeries of wheels within wheels, it is easily conceivable that the cogs of the greater wheel of planetary spheres may correspond with the cogs of some smaller wheel of an individual life, and the dial plate of a macrocosmos with that of a microcosmos. One may foretell the movements of a second hand by observing those of a minute hand without the latter being the cause of the former.

F. W. THURSTON, M.A.

MR. HENRY BURTON.—It is with great pleasure that we call attention to the announcement in our advertisement columns of a testimonial to be presented to this gentleman previous to his departure to the Antipodes. Mr. Burton has worked long and faithfully in the cause of Spiritualism, and we feel sure the best wishes of all who know him will follow him to his new home.

TRANSITION OF PROF. DENTON.—It is with regret we have to announce the departure of this well-known Spiritualist to the higher life. The details to hand are very meagre, the following telegram to the Boston Herald being the only information we have. "Prof. Denton, who is well-known as an eminent geologist and lecturer, has been travelling for the last two years, accompanied by his two sons, Shelby and Sherman, engaged in lecturing and scientific exploration in Australia, New Zealand, and China. He was supposed to have been in Java at the time of his death, and, it is probable, was a victim of the earthquake in that country."

HISTORY is the Newgate Calendar of kings and rulers. It finds no materials in the happiness or virtue of states, and is therefore little better than a record of human crime and misery.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M. A. (Oxon.)"

"Sinners and Saints,"* a book of travels in America, is excellent reading. The author spent three months among the Mormons, and if he is right the rest of the world is wrong in its estimate of these polygamous people. Charity and self-sacrifice animate all their actions. The men are all steady and industrious; the women all happy with their fraction of a husband, and more industrious still. Sobriety is universal; poverty unknown, or at once relieved; immorality there is none. There are no monopolists of wealth to grind down a starving poor; but a general sufficiency, and an all-pervading content. The people are unostentatiously pious with a practical piety that is devoid of cant. I never read a more charming word-picture. Mr. Robinson is a keen observer, and gives chapter and verse for his facts. He is severe on "Gentile" opinion and "Gentile" slander, and leaves on his readers' mind a strong impression of a simple, honest, and pious folk with a strange fancy for polygamy. This, he thinks, has set up the backs of their neighbours. It may have had something to do with it.

Now-a-days one can hardly open a book without finding Spiritualism in it in some form. So it is with no sense of surprise that I find Mr. Robinson advising any Spiritualists among his readers to study Mormonism. "The Saints," he says, "have long ago formulated into accepted doctrines those mysteries of the occult world which Spiritualists outside the [Mormon] faith are still investigating. Your problems are their axioms." The Mormons are, in many ways, akin to the Shakers, and both are instinctive Spiritualists. All people are, who have not crushed out the spiritual instincts by a long course of artificiality, the normal product of civilisation; and who are not sunk in that exclusive care for material things which is the normal product of scientific culture. Mr. Robinson devotes a chapter to the story of Jacob Hamlin, a Mormon missionary among the Indians. The miracles and prophecies related in connection with this phenomenal old man would, Mr. Robinson opines, "stagger even Madame Blavatsky herself." "He cured his neighbours of deadly ailments by the laying on of hands, and foretold conversion, deaths, and other events with unvarying accuracy. . . . If cattle were lost he could always dream where they were. If sickness prevailed he knew beforehand who would suffer, and which of them would die, and which would recover. If Indians were about, angels gave him in his sleep the first warnings of his danger."

All these stories Mr. Robinson tells gravely, and is evidently impressed by their truth. "On one occasion," he goes on, "Jacob dreamed that he was walking in a friendly manner with some of the members of a certain tribe, when he picked up a piece of shining substance which stuck to his fingers. He at once went off to the tribe in question. They received him as a friend, and he stayed with them. One day, passing a lodge, 'the Spirit' whispered to him 'Here is the shining substance you saw in your dream.' But all he saw was a squaw and a boy papoose. However, he went up to the squaw, and asked for the boy. She naturally demurred to the request, but to her astonishment the boy, gathering up his bow and arrows, urged compliance, and Jacob carried off his dream-revealed 'lump.' After a while he asked the boy why he was so eager to come, though he had never seen a white man before, and the boy answered, 'My Spirit told me that you were coming to my father's lodge for me on a certain day, and that I was to go with you, and when the day came I went out to the edge of the wood, and lit a fire to shew you the way to me.' And Jacob remembered then that it was the smoke of a fire that had led him to that particular camp, instead of another towards which he had intended riding." As pretty a story, and as simply truthful as any I remember!

The portrait Mr. Robinson draws of Jacob Hamlin would pass for any adept, save that Jacob was far from being a recluse. "The impressive solemnity of his language, his low, measured tones, his contemplative, earnest attitude, the Indian-like gravity of his countenance," quite won Mr. Robinson. "That he speaks the implicit truth, according to his own belief, I am as certain as that the water of the Great Salt Lake is salt!" Yet he tells us that "his displeasure killed men, that is to say, they went from his presence, sickened, and died." So frequent was this that the Indians believe that evil befalls those who hurt or offend a Mormon. There was an amount of simple piety and trust in spiritual guidance that drew Jacob to the Indians. "He found tribes that believed in and acted upon dreams, as he did; that accepted the guidance of second-sight; that relied upon prayer for obtaining temporal necessities; that lived by faith; and that were awaiting the fulfilment of prophecy. All this was to him nothing but common sense. For instance, he said, 'I know that some people do not believe in dreams and night-visions. I myself do not believe in them when they arise from a disordered stomach, but in other kinds I have been forewarned of coming events, and received much instruction.' All this impresses Mr. Robinson, but exercises him too. After many queries as to what he is to say to it all, to this primitive faith, these psychical potencies, this "reverting to an intellectual type that the world had supposed to be extinct (!)," he helplessly concludes, "The best thing, perhaps, is to say Hum meditatively, and think no more about it!" On the contrary, I should say, if there be any Jacob Hamlins who have the power of their prototype and no sphere of action, let them come over to London. We want "missionaries" of that type badly, and can employ a whole tribe.

The Spiritual Record, for November, gives us the conclusion of Lord Dunraven's experiences: a paper on automatic writing à propos of the recent volume of "Spirit-teachings." This paper was contributed as far back as 1870, as an introduction to a little book called "Glimpses of a Brighter Land," and is from the pen of A. M. H. W. It is full of suggestive interest. The writer notices three cases, those of Mr. Wilkinson, Mr. Howitt, and myself, in which the gift of automatic writing or drawing was preceded by violent action of the hand. Mr. Wilkinson's hand, holding a pencil, "moved with such velocity as I have never seen in a hand or arm before or since." "Exactly the same experience has been recorded by William Howitt, in the first development of automatic writing in his own case in 1858." In my own case "the right arm seemed to be seized about the middle of the forearm, and dashed up and down violently with a noise resembling that of a number of paviers at work." I well remember the noise, and especially the pain of the swollen ball of the thumb for many days after. The object with me—the immediate object—seemed to be to "get up power" for some physical manifestation; but the event was rapidly followed by my own development as a psychic.

A paper on "Direct Spirit Writings and Drawings" is concluded. Some very striking facts are given. Mr. F. W. H. Myers' essays, and Mrs. Howitt Watts' "Pioneers of the Spiritual Reformation" are noticed very favourably. The story of the recovery of some lost leases through Mr. Rouse's mediumship in 1872 is familiar, but bears repetition. Through Mr. Rouse's hand was written "Try Exeter," and sure enough the querist remembered that there was at Exeter an old friend of his father's in the person of Mr. Boyd, or rather Dean Boyd, as he then was. On being applied to, the Dean at once said that a bundle of parchments had been left in his care. These on being opened proved to be the missing leases. A very good account of a séance with Mr. Husk, and a number of Editorial Notes on things in general and Spiritualism in particular, make up a really good number.

Touching the Kiddle incident, I quote from Mrs. Watts' recent volume a curious case which has a certain bearing on what is undoubtedly a great though mysterious spiritual law, which must be recognised and reckoned with in the discussion of these subjects. There have been from time to time, in the history of Spiritualism, cases of manifest plagiarism which we have referred to the action of tricky spirits, and in which the medium has been fully exonerated from blame, as being the passive instrument of the deception. It would seem that there are also cases in which authors possess what Mrs. Watts calls a kind of clairvoyance as regards incidents, characters, or plots of their works. She instances Dickens and Charlotte Brontë,* and L.E.L. (who in one of her novels describes, by anticipation, her own death by poison). This latter, however, is hardly so precise as to be to the point in our present calculation. "It would seem," she says, "that the poet, going inward into the depths of his being—as he must do, if he be a poet—and free to enter the realm of true imagination, enters into the realm of the 'Eternal Now,' where Past and Future are bodied forth with equal intensity, and become one with that which, in the World of Time, we call the Present, and which, even here, is so evanescent that we cannot retain it for a moment's existence, as the present." Reference may also be made to a case of a parallel nature. Mrs. Shelley, in her novel (written almost immediately before her husband's loss), "Valperga," makes the fate of the heroine identical with that of the poet—she is lost in a storm upon the self-same coast, the catastrophe itself remaining a frightful mystery.

The narrative of Mr. Howitt's case to which I have alluded is this:—In a novel which appeared from his pen in 1867, entitled "Woodburn Grange," is a chapter headed "Scammel's Death."

"Scammel is a fierce, almost gigantic poacher, concerned in a mysterious murder, upon the unravelling of which mystery, of course, much depends. At length the poacher is captured; and bound with cords, is brought in a cart for examination before Sir Henry Clavering, a magistrate and important personage in the story. Under pretence of great suffering on the part of Scammel through the tightness of his bonds, they are unloosed in the presence of Sir Henry. Thus at liberty, he rises up, so tall and stalwart a figure that the magistrates feel the imprudence of their concession. He darts forward, escaping through the window, and, flying headlong across the park, followed by Sir Henry and his servants, he makes, after an abortive attempt to escape by the woods, for the river Trent—is pursued by the men and Sir Henry in boats, whilst with much desperation he swims down the current. With stupendous strength and agility the daring hunter of woods and midnight fields ploughed his way through the water. His muscular arms sent back waves like a strong pair of oars, and that black curly head of his rose at every stroke more visibly above the stream. . . . At once the desperate murderer cast a furious glance on one boat and then on the other, from which several hands were already straining to seize him, and throwing aloft his arms, with a savage, half-drowned exclamation, 'Damnation!' he went down perpendicularly like a stone. There was a burst of horror from all in the boats. The poacher-murderer had drowned himself!"

"Shortly after the publication of this novel, the author read a paragraph in the newspapers of the day, giving account of the seizure of a poacher or poachers, in Nottinghamshire, together with the escape of one of the gang from the presence of the magistrate when brought up for examination; of his making for the adjacent river Trent, and of his death, as above described, in the river! What renders the matter still more noteworthy is the fact that the real event occurred at the very place throughout pictured in the author's mind as the scene of this imaginary incident in his novel!"

The mysterious and occult properties of numbers have always been to me an enticing subject of speculation. I have friends to whom they are, in a very remarkable degree, ominous. They regard them as their objective method of communion with the unseen world. That they may be so, I have no doubt; but I always feel myself unable to tell how far the normal properties of numbers may seem, to an ignorant person like myself, of occult significance. Here now is a remarkable fact, published in the Times of October 30th. One of the banks of a provincial city, within three hours' journey of London, had on July 7th, 1879, two customers each bearing the name of Brown, strangers to each other. Mr. Brown number one has his passbook made up, and finds in it a credit for cash £20 0s. 7d. He asks the clerk for an account of the source of this very odd sum. Referring to the books, the clerk finds that on the same day both Mr. Browns are credited with the same amount. Mr. Brown number two had paid in the amount, made up of odd sums, to his own credit. Mr. Brown number one had received it as an Indian dividend. Now what are the chances against such a coincidence, (1) of the same queer sum, (2) the same date, (3) the same bank, (4) the same surname, not a common one in the city? Enormous, no doubt. I suppose the answer to my original query is, that this is an isolated case, whereas the others to which I alluded are perpetually recurrent. But this fact which I have detailed shows how careful one must be in, dealing with the occult, to eliminate every possibility of error. It would, in the light of experience, be quite absurd to deny that invisible friends may use numbers to communicate with us. They use any form of symbolism, or of objective means ready at hand, to signify their presence and express their wishes. But this is just the typical case over which the average Philistine chuckles, and cries ha! ha!

"WHO ARE OUR SPIRITUAL ENEMIES?"

A PATCHWORK FROM BÖHME.

II.

I shall have to draw so much from Böhme in order to give his solution of the mystery of evil that my own words will be little more than connecting links for his. Earthworms quote very largely from depths of earth which few eyes care to examine, and the little heaps of sifted mould which they bring up from the rough confusion of a lower soil, serve to fertilise its more superficial plane. My ambition is to perform the office of an earthworm in another sort of ground.

When the creation of human beings is spoken of, it is as if a creature such as man could be willed into existence by Divine "fiat" without any possibility of defect (though that would make the derived being equal to its Creator), and without any formative constituents of nature. Any idea of means to this end is usually deemed unworthy of being connected with the work of Omnipotence; and this in a universe where, so far as we can judge, no end is attained without an enchainment of means that astonishes by its subtle niceties of adaptation, whenever it can be traced out.

"Many authors," says Böhme ("Aurora," chap. 19, v. 67), "have written that Heaven and earth are framed out of nothing, but I do wonder that among so many excellent men there hath not one been found that would yet describe the true ground, seeing the same God which now is hath been from eternity. Now, where nothing is, there nothing can come to be; all things must have a root, else nothing can grow. If the seven spirits of nature had not been from eternity then there would be no angel, no Heaven, also no earth have come to be." (N.B.—He means eternal nature, as all the rest of his teaching proves.) Further on he refers to these seven spirits again thus: "Thou must know that all the seven spirits of God are in the earth, and generate as they do in Heaven. For the earth is in God, and God never died." ("Aurora," chap. 21, par. 78.) And in man, "for man's house of flesh is also such a house as the dark deep of this world's, in which the seven spirits of God generate themselves." (Ibid, chap. 26, par. 81.)

To explain by Böhme's own words what he means by these seven spirits of Eternal Nature, and the seven "forms" in the nature of our universe derived from that, would be to write a small volume, not very intelligible either. I must therefore hazard an attempt, roughly and briefly, to indicate what he tells about them, viz., that the Infinite Source of all being willed to manifest the infinite wonders of the Abyssal only God; that this will caused the magnetic (attractive) compression of desire, the darkness of an enclosure of a previously unseeking infinitude of powers and ideas which* he calls "the nothing"—in contradiction to any conceivable something, and sometimes the "liberty." ("The Lubet of the liberty doth introduce itself into Nature and essence, that it might be manifest in power, wonder, and being."—"Signatura Rerum," chap. 14, par. 26.) This enclosure of the desire, condensing power, so to speak, for concentrated purpose, is the cause of the second form of nature (itself the first)—the mobility, with its ceaseless wrestling to escape from that strong astringent force, and both together are the cause of the third—the anguish generated by such contrary action, and the divided sensibility it necessitates; this again drives on to such intensity of whirling motion as to enkindle fire, the fourth form; this again, by the secret influence of the Lubet, producing light and love, the fifth; sound and resulting intelligence the sixth; and all these finding in the seventh substantiality, their completion and full appeasement. [This is, I am well aware, a very lame and crude representation of Böhme's revelation as to the origin of Nature; but this consoles me for my total inability to do justice to my theme; competent writers have admirably written about it—Dionysius Freher and William Law, for instance, and what they wrote is unread. Inferior articles have in the present day a better chance of attention.]

* For the vast infinite space desireth enclosure and narrowness, wherein it may manifest itself, for else in the wide stillness there would be no manifestation. Therefore there must be an attraction and inclosing out of which the manifestation appeareth."—"Threefold Life," chap. 1, par. 33.

It may be well to quote (abbreviated) one of Böhme's shortest summaries to justify my paraphrase; it can hardly be said to explain.

"We find seven especial properties in Nature, whereby this only mother worketh all things, which are these; viz., first, the Desire, which is astringent, cold and hard and dark; secondly, bitterness, which is the sting of the astringent hard enclosure; this is the cause of all motion and life; thirdly, the anguish by reason of the raging of the impression where the impressed darkness falleth into a tearing anguish and pain by reason of the sting. Fourthly, the fire, where the eternal will (the Lubet) doth introduce itself into a darting flash" . . . "with which the hardness is again consumed and introduced into a corporeal moving spirit. Fifthly, the egress of the free will out of the darkness and out of the fire, and the potent desire which it hath sharpened in the fire, doth now in the light's desire draw into itself the essence from the fire, dying according to its hunger, the which is now water, and in the lustre it is a tincture from the fire and light, viz., a love desire. Sixthly, the voice or sound. Seventhly, whatsoever the six forms are spiritually that the seventh is essentially, or in real substance.

"Thus these are the seven forms of the Mother of all Beings, whence all whatsoever is in this world is generated." ("Signatura Rerum," chap. 14, from par. 10 to 15.)

I am painfully conscious of the obscurity of this passage; on first reading it will affect the mind as wonderful nonsense; but could any true explanation of creating life be sensed by the intelligence of man in his present state? I am sure it could not. The entirely ignorant must take something on trust, before any foundation of knowledge can be laid.

Readers who are fortunate enough to possess any of Böhme's writings will find in each of them abundant mention of these seven forces or forms of Eternal Nature. What I fail to make as intelligible as the subject admits, reference to his fuller account may make clearer. For instance, "Aurora," chap. 18, par. 28. But I must observe that had it not been for Freher's more lucid, though very profound treatise on "Deity as manifested through Nature," I should never, from Böhme alone, have been able to understand what he meant by the Lubet, or how the good pleasure of Divine love acted through the wrestling wheel of the seven Spirits of God. Those who have access to this very rare work or to C. Walton's Memorial of Law (unpublished, but to be found in most of our largest public libraries), which contains large extracts from other writings of Freher will find the trouble of following his close line of argument richly repaid.

Now, it is in the arrest of the right evolution of these seven forms of Eternal Nature that all evil begins, and before we deal with the question, "Who are our spiritual enemies?" we ought to learn how it is that in a world created by a holy God, anything can be antagonistic; and, as these "forms" are the seven Spirits of God, "generating God," as Böhme has it, the Scriptural saying, "I create evil" (Isaiah xlv. 7) is strictly true; though it is none the less true that God is love and did not will evil.

Let us try if by any possible analogy we can help ourselves to understand this passage ever so little. Suppose that an embryonic form of human origin was shewn to us, we should regard it with horror; it is an abortion, a comparatively formless and revolting approach to what, in its full growth, is a beautiful human shape; and yet it is a requisite preparation for that matured excellence. All sinful beings, in our kind of bodies or out of them, are in this sense embryonic monsters; they have fallen short of right evolution; they act and feel in God and by the powers of God, and yet are contrary to God and remain in the wrath of God because good in them has not been wrought out to true being. And what is the cause of evil is equally the cause of the ceaseless unrest of human life. "Rest," F. Baader tells us, "is unimpeded total activity. Every being acts restlessly so long as it has not attained the totality of its energies. The striving forces of Time seek rest, not to die but to be active without hindrance."

Perhaps Frederick's image of the broken ring gives as good an idea of the cause of antagonism from breach of original sequence as any form of words could. After a long and careful exposition of the original good of the darkness which must underlie the production of fire before light itself can be manifested, he continues: "It belonged therefore essentially to God's eternal manifestation, of which it was—as to our weak apprehension—the first beginning that could have been made, if its end was to be attained; and which beginning having never been separated from its end, could not have been evil and stand in opposition to its end, which was good, and both together were but one thing. For this end found and took hold of its beginning and swallowed it up, so that they made together but one globe wherein they were inseparably within each other, the light manifested in the darkness and shining in it, and the darkness hid in the light, and not comprehending it; as we see in a simile, in every ring or circle in which the beginning and the end are united and combined, and which would never be called a circle or a ring if it had no beginning and end, yet so that the end always lays hold of the beginning and swallows it up into itself, and the beginning be lost and disappear in the end. Now, Lucifer, who, it is granted, is not a maker, still less a creator, but a destroyer, first broke the harmonious ring in himself—for inasmuch as he was a creature, inferior and posterior to Eternal Nature, he must necessarily have had it within himself—and thereby the beginning of it appeared by itself divided from its end, and was placed in strong opposition against it; just as when a ring is broken a beginning and end appear opposite to each other, whereas it was before but one entire thing."

Lucifer, according to Böhmé, first looked back into the strong first forms of Eternal Nature, in which he thought with his fire to prove superiority over the meekness of light; and in this process of imagining for himself self-chosen elevation, his light extinguished and his fire remained in the dark world.

To enlarge upon this portion of the subject would carry this paper beyond bounds, and is not necessary for its aim; only it should not be forgotten that any attempt to popularise doctrines of this vast scope must be at the sacrifice of all due proportion; many an adjacent branch of the subject must be ignored if minds unused to such themes are to be won to attend to them at all. The point I wish to make good without fatiguing by too copious extracts from my teacher, is that what we call evil took its rise when first Spirits of exceeding power, acting in God with all the Divine forces of the first four Spirits of Eternal Nature, "fell short of the glory of God," and broke the perfect sequence of right evolution. And that these mighty angels, with all their constituent Spirits, have for millions of ages remained in this state of tremendous opposition to light, to love, to all that is called in a special sense God—though nothing can have being out of, or apart from, the first Creator—God, the Father of spirits.

If I am told that all this belief in Lucifer and the fallen angels is the remains of superstition, an obsolete engine of priestcraft, I would request answer to this one question—since no philosopher will, I suppose, deny the truth of this dictum of St. Martin's: "La mesure d'une erreur est en même temps la mesure de la vérité correspondante," ("L'Esprit des Choses," Vol. I. p. 88)—what can the truth be which corresponds to these old world beliefs in a mighty tempter, a cruel adversary, a tormentor of evil men?

If both philosophy and theology are silent, surely the answer which during two centuries has satisfied some of the strongest intellects, might be accepted now for at least a working hypothesis.

OCCULT SYMPATHY.

The wife of a friend of mine, living in Staffordshire, is liable to sudden attacks of neuralgia, which come without warning when she is in perfect health. On such occasions her husband, when at a distance from her, has sympathetic notice of her suffering. He feels much depressed and exhausted, and has several times written to express his sorrow for her attack, and has always found that his apprehensions were justified by fact. A few years ago she was staying away from him in London in view of a painful operation. He was naturally very anxious about her and was hearing twice a day from her. On Thursday night, December 13th, 1877, he awoke, distinctly hearing himself called, Frank! Frank! He thought it might be a cry of suffering from his wife, and wrote off to her by the early post on Friday. The reports from her, however, subsequently proved the same as usual. But by the second post, on Friday he had a letter calling him to go to Newmarket, where, unknown to him, his brother was very ill. It was too late then to start till Saturday morning, and when he arrived he found that his brother had died on Friday night, and that on the Thursday night he had repeatedly asked for "Frank," being anxious to have him sent for, as my friend believes, in order to make some alterations in his will. The number of things my friend had to attend to completely drove the call on Thursday night out of his head, but on finding that his wife had been as well as usual that night, he was persuaded that the call had proceeded from his dying brother.

DIRECT SPIRIT WRITING.

A correspondent of the Revue Spirite writes the particulars of a séance held some months ago at Syracuse, N.Y., Mr. Joseph Caffrey being the medium. To this séance Mr. Malcolm, the inventor of "Malcolm's Telescope Rifle," had been prevailed upon to come. In his pocket he brought a new and unused note book. After various physical manifestations, a spirit addressed him by the direct voice, saying how glad he was to see him and that he had brought the note book, which he asked him to hold under the table. He took the book from his pocket and did so. In a few minutes writing was heard; on its ceasing, it was found to be a communication from his friend Bellinger, the inventor of a peculiar target; it related to a subject in which they alone had been jointly concerned, and closed by exhorting him to give up his notion that death finished a man. There was more writing on another page, so minute that it was illegible without a magnifying glass. It was written within the space of a square-half-inch, and the copy of it in ordinary writing filled a page and a-half of letter paper. It was signed by another of his deceased friends, Spencer, an optician, and was upon a recondite point in optics. Acting upon the view contained in this communication, Mr. Malcolm says that he has constructed his best telescope.

The Rev. H. R. Haweis' sermon on Transcendental Physics, the official report of which appeared in these pages, has been reprinted as an 8pp. supplement to the September number of the Harbinger of Light.

SPIRITUALISM AND OUR ORTHODOX LEADERS.

By F. J. THEOBALD.

I.

Dr. Norman Macleod.

Whilst reading the biography of that eminently Christ-like man, Dr. Norman Macleod, I observed that although throughout the two large volumes, the subject of modern Spiritualism, as such, was not once alluded to, no Spiritualist could fail to recognise that, whether or no he ever identified himself with, or shewed any active interest in the movement, he was really in full harmony with the Spiritualistic teachings, and the highest phases of their belief. Dr. Macleod continually expresses his firm belief in what we call "Progressive Spirit Life," and what the orthodox Christians of our Churches speak of as "the final restitution of all things." He also rejoiced in the assurance of the loving presence, with us, of the spirits of those who have passed on. And that, inasmuch as he knew they preserved their individuality, unaltered (beyond the spiritual expansion, which the transition from earth to the spirit sphere would of necessity supply), he believed that their interest in us, in all the varied vicissitudes of our life, was unflinching; that they were permitted to watch over us, "as ministering spirits, sent forth to minister." At page 375, Vol. II., we read "A great sadness weighed on him, a weariness of . . . the burden and the mystery of life." But out of this arose a more child-like clinging to Christ, and to the love and goodness of God."

Deeply affected by the disturbed condition of opinion in the world and the Church, he cherished only a fuller confidence in order finally coming out of disorder; and feeling his own life-work was over, he entered the more keenly into speculations as to the character of the life beyond the grave.

The future state—the society, occupations, and joy—of the blessed dead had been a favourite theme with him for many years, but during the last few days of his life it seemed to engross his thoughts. . . . "After all," he said, on one occasion, "death is a wrong name . . . it is birth into true life."

(P. 385.) Whilst endeavouring to comfort a bereaved relative, he talked with more than usual power . . . regarding the glorified life of those who had departed in the Lord.

He recalled the names and characters of deceased relatives, and described the joy of meeting and recognising them.

He spoke of his father, of James, of sisters, and uncles who were dead, and of John Macintosh. . . . When a friend chanced to allude to their departure as a loss, he vehemently remonstrated against such a view. "Love is possession! Love is possession!" he repeated, with emphasis. . . .

(P. 388.) Dr. Macleod described with great delight the dreams he had been enjoying; or rather, the visions, which seemed to be passing vividly before his eyes, even while he was speaking. "You cannot imagine what exquisite pictures I see," he exclaimed. "I never beheld more glorious Highlands, majestic mountains and glens; brown heather, tinted with purple, and burns—clear, clear burns! and above, a sky of intense blue—so blue, without a cloud!"

(P. 390.) Dr. Macleod said to his wife, "I believe I will get better, but I wish you to record for my good, and for our good, afterwards, that in this hurricane I have had deep thoughts of God. I feel as if He said, 'We know one another. I love you, I forgive you, I put my arms around you.' . . . I have had constant joy, and the happy thought continually whispered, 'Thou art with me?' Not many would understand me. They would put down much that I have felt to the delirium of weakness; but I have had deep spiritual insight."

When he was speaking of God's dealings, the expression of his face and his accents were as if he was addressing one actually present. Still more intimately than ever his fellowship was with the Father and the Son. . . . To his daughter he said, some few hours before he passed on:—"If I had strength, I could tell you things that would do you good all your life! . . . I have glimpses of Heaven that no tongue, nor pen, nor words can describe."

THE CHEMISTRY OF CHARACTER.

John, and Peter, and Robert, and Paul, God in His wisdom created them all. John was a statesman, and Peter a slave, Robert a preacher, and Paul—a knave. Evil or good, as the case might be, White or coloured, or bond or free—John, and Peter, and Robert, and Paul, God in His wisdom created them all.

Out of earth's elements, mingled with flame, Out of life's compounds of glory and shame, Fashioned and shaped by no will of their own, And helpless into life's history thrown; Born to conditions they could not foresee, John, and Peter, and Robert, and Paul, God in His wisdom created them all.

John was the head and the heart of his State, Was trusted and honoured, was noble and great. Peter was made 'neath life's burden to groan, And never once dreamed that his soul was his own. Robert great glory and honour received, For zealously preaching what no one believed. While Paul of the pleasures of sin took his fill, And gave up his life to the service of ill.

It chanced that these men, in their passing away From earth and its conflicts, all died on one day. John was mourned through the length and the breadth of the land;

Peter fell 'neath the lash in a merciless hand; Robert died with the praise of the Lord on his tongue; While Paul was convicted of murder, and hung. John, and Peter, and Robert, and Paul, The purpose of life was fulfilled in them all.

Men said of the statesman—"How noble and brave!" But of Peter, alas!—"he was only a slave." Of Robert—"Tis well with his soul—it is well;" While Paul they consigned to the torments of hell. Born by one law, through all nature the same, What made them differ? and who was to blame? John, and Peter, and Robert, and Paul, God in His wisdom created them all.

But in that region of infinite light, Where the soul of the black man is pure as the white, Out where the spirit, through sorrow made wise, No longer resorts to deception and lies— Out where the flesh can no longer control The freedom and faith of the God-given soul, Who shall determine what change may befall John, and Peter, and Robert, and Paul?

John may in wisdom and goodness increase; Peter rejoice in an infinite peace; Robert may learn that the truths of the Lord Are more in the spirit, and less in the word; And Paul may be blest with a holier birth Than the passions of man had allowed him on earth. John, and Peter, and Robert and Paul, God in His wisdom created them all.

REVIEW.

PIONEERS OF THE SPIRITUAL REFORMATION.*

I.—DR. JUSTINUS KERNER.

Mrs. Howitt Watts has given us, in this handsome volume, a vivid picture of Kerner, "the most prominent figure in the spiritual circle of Germany," as Howitt calls him. Considering the age in which he lived—1786-1862—he was an extremely remarkable man, one who was indeed a Pioneer. It is not too much to say that he prepared the way by his many psychological publications, and especially by his account of "The Seeress of Prevorst" for the reception of the developments of modern Spiritualism. The Rochester Knockings followed hard on the publication of Kerner's remarkable volume, in which he detailed his varied experiences with that most gifted seeress. In it he had pointed to a class of spirit—Poltergeister—who seemed inarticulate, but who "would loudly announce their impatient presence by varied and loud sounds." When the Fox mediums invented their system of spiritual telegraphy, they gave a voice to these dumb spirits of whom Kerner had spoken, and

"The legion of waiters on the threshold of the intermediate state became at once, as it were, gifted with speech, and legions of voices—many at first only stammerers and stutterers—answered with bewildering confusion from the other side of the River of Death. Once set to work, this telegraph, according to the economy of the spirit-life, was embodied by higher classes of disembodied spirits as the readiest mode of communication with their friends left on earth.

"Modern Spiritualism has invariably exhibited itself as the breaker-down of bars and barriers, as the unbinder of mental bonds, as the letter-in of light into dark places—functions, assuredly, of a Spirit of Salvation and Healing.

"Of the advent of this Spirit of Benevolence, Kerner was, undoubtedly, a distinguished herald."

Very fitly, then, does Kerner take the first place in the list of Pioneers of the Spiritual Reformation.

* Pioneers of the Spiritual Reformation. Life and Works of Dr. Justinus Kerner; William Howitt and his Work for Spiritualism. Biographical Sketches by A. M. Howitt Watts. Price 10s. The Psychological Press Association.

Kerner's life is full of interest, but the picture drawn of him is one that would be marred by abridgements, and must be read in extenso in Mrs. Watts's own words, always vivid, clear, and chosen with perfect taste. Here is a word-picture of young Kerner at the time when he obtained his doctor's diploma.

"Picture to yourself a youth of the simplest and most thoroughly negligent attire, possessed of the most entire indifference towards things which usually trouble people, with a stooping bearing, an irregular gait, a constant inclination to lean upon a chair rather than comfortably to sit upon it—and yet with a slender, well-grown, well-looking youth—and then you will have a complete picture of my Kerner."

It was in the year 1826 that Kerner published the first of his works dealing with the inner life of man. This was "The History of Two Somnambulists." These were in fact patients of his, conspicuous among the number who filled his house for the marvellous phenomena exhibited by them during the course of their mesmeric treatment. Subsequently came his account of "The Seeress of Prevorst," published in 1829, after the death of Madame Hauffe. It is by this book that Kerner is most widely known. But it would be very unjust to his memory not to credit him with the great literary activity which during thirty years kept him constantly before the public, at one time as a poet, at another as a psychologist, and yet again as editor of periodicals, through the pages of which, as well as through his own books, he made most valuable contributions to psychological and spiritual science.

From these works Mrs. Watts gives us some well-selected specimens. From "The History of the Two Somnambulists"—a book rare in Germany and not translated into English—we have some most remarkable experiences of Christiana, a girl of thirteen years, the daughter of a respectable vine-grower of Weinsberg. She had dwelt with tender regret on the death of a little brother, and her yearning after re-union with him had apparently set in action within her the power she so much desired. Her spiritual faculties were developed. She became clairvoyante, had prophetic dreams and visions, and prescribed for herself when in the trance-state. It was her brother whom she saw and conversed with. "My Frederick tells me so," was her cry. She had conquered through the power of her great love, and was re-united to her brother.

It is a matter for regret that this work, which is second only in interest to "The Seeress of Prevorst," should not be translated into English.

The life of Madame Hauffe, the Seeress of Prevorst, has been popularised by Mrs. Crowe's translation of Kerner's work, as well as by various articles in the Spiritual Magazine by Mr. Thomas Shorter. Space forbids any attempt to recount the phenomena of this most strange life, as observed and recorded by Dr. Kerner during the years that she was an inmate of his house. Her various states are interesting, and are thus enumerated:—

"1st. That in which she ordinarily existed, wherein she appeared to be awake, although she was not so; but, on the contrary, in the first stage of her inner life. She declared that many persons were in this state, of whom it was not suspected, and who were not aware of it themselves.

"2nd. The Magnetic Dream. She believed many persons to be in this condition who were considered insane.

"3rd. In the half-waking state, which exhibited itself more especially by its writing and speaking the inner language (to which reference is repeatedly made in the later portion of the volume). She said she spoke this language when her spirit was in intimate conjunction with her soul."

"4th. The sleep-waking state when she was clairvoyante and prescribed.

Another very valuable contribution of Kerner's to psychology is his "Histories of Modern Possession." He had made a profound study of the subject, and had arrived at the conviction that there were special characteristics in those persons who avowed themselves to be possessed by evil spirits, which differentiated the cases from those of ordinary insanity. One case recorded by him with great minuteness "contains probably not only every known phase of demoniac possession, but every known phase of haunting by earth-bound spirits." I allude to the case of the Maid of Orlach, which Mrs. Watts transcribes in full, and which is most instructive in its revelations. It evidently impressed Mrs. Watts, and gave rise in her mind to some very suggestive queries, which we venture to present for the consideration of our readers. They are full of wise suggestiveness.

* By the soul (Seele) is meant throughout, by the Seeress, the abstract idea of the sum of all the intellectual and moral faculties. By the spirit (Geist) is indicated the pure reason, the conscience, the intuitive sense of the good, true, and beautiful—the eer-soul; in one word, the Holy Ghost: all being synonymous.

"Wherefore is it, that almost invariably, it is upon individuals of a religious, unworldly, guileless, and innocent nature, that this infestation of demons falls, usually upon youths, upon young girls, women, and even upon little children?"

"Wherefore is it, that neither crime, nor evil disposition, nor dissolute habits of life appear to exist as the attracting causes of the demoniac presence?"

"Wherefore is it, that the bodies thus ruthlessly tormented and racked, are singularly robust, unprejudiced to disease, and frequently endowed, not only with health and strength, but with remarkable beauty? Thus, that the individuals afflicted by demoniac possession, are in their spiritual and physical natures apparently opposed to such affliction."

"Wherefore is it, that the demons, as if impelled by an inscrutable doom, are ever seeking, not only to incarnate themselves in these pure, fleshly tabernacles, so unwillingly yielded up by their rightful inmates to the usurpation of demoniac uncleanness, but when once admitted into these dwellings, clean 'swept and garnished,' appear still ever impelled by their inscrutable doom to make through innocent, borrowed lips, confession of monstrous crimes committed in far-off days together with descriptions of their present purgatorial torments?"

"Wherefore is it, that after this confession has been wrung from the unclean self-accusers, through the pressure of this same inscrutable doom, they announce themselves as partially loosed from the weight of the anguish of recollection, from the weight of those mysterious chains which still bind them down to the scene of former crime, hinting in strange words of an approaching reappearance before the judgment-seat of God?"

"Wherefore is it, that another class of disembodied spirits, less debased than the tormentors, yet nevertheless earth-bound and in intimate connection with their fate,—at once victims, fellow-sufferers, and instigators to higher life—appear upon the scene as protectors of the suffering, victimised human beings, whose robust, clean bodies appear to have been granted for a time as the mysterious combat-ground for a more than mortal conflict?"

"Wherefore is it, that if the body of the 'possessed' be subjected to such violent ill-usage the soul belonging to that body should be watched over, consoled, and kept from contact with impurity, in a manner so entirely superhuman?"

"Assuredly in all these facts the mind of an intelligent spectator must recognise a marvellous coherence of action, tending towards some sublime end, and the thrilling suggestion must occur, becoming ever stronger and clearer, that possibly the key to the solution of the direful mystery of possession, is nothing less than a new revelation of a truth, ancient as the most ancient mythology, and the central fact of the Christian Dispensation—salvation wrought for the sinful, through sinless-suffering. That, possibly, whilst witnessing the paroxysms of a 'Maid of Orlach,' the spectator has beheld the acts of an unutterably affecting 'Divine Drama,' planned by the Poet of Poets, where the actors are disembodied spirits, where the stage is the fleshly body of humanity, and where the final act will be—progression of all the actors towards God—yes, progression—slow though it may be—even of the blackest demons of the lowest hells."

Kerner's last work is devoted to correspondence with Mesmer, and "Researches after Memorials of him in the Place of his Birth," a volume of 212 pages, teeming, as all Kerner's books do, with interest and instruction to Spiritualists. These records form some fifty pages of Mrs. Watts's volume, and present a sharply defined picture of the great healer.

A notice of that part of the volume which relates to the labours of William Howitt in the cause of Spiritualism must be reserved for another occasion. In thus imperfectly directing attention to Mrs. Howitt Watts's admirable addition to our literature, we refrain from attempting what would be, indeed, impossible, viz., to point out its many literary charms, or to indicate its very high value to the student of psychological science.

MEDIUMSHIP IN CENTRAL ASIA.

Under the above heading the Revue Spirite inserts a letter of Prince Adeka from St. Petersburg:—"The Emir of Bokhara," says the writer, "sent his son Seyd-Abdul to represent him at the recent coronation of the Czar. His chief interpreter was Alime Jounouseof, who brought to me a letter of introduction from a friend at Samarkand, Russian Turkestan."

"I had frequent conversations with Jounouseof during his stay here. He had travelled in Arabia and India, knew several of the languages of the East, and spoke Russian well. He was well informed in the physical sciences. I introduced the subject of Spiritualism to him. He told me that there had existed for generations among the Mahomedans of Central Asia a spiritual brotherhood, called Muridists, in which magnetism and mediumistic phenomena were studied. He said that he himself was a Muridist; that among them are remarkable healers and clairvoyants; that they were required to practise self-denial and cultivate the good of the neighbour. They who join the brotherhood have to study under the direction of an elder, and mortify the body by privations in food and clothing. When they have attained mastery over the flesh, they are put to the study and practice of healing by the imposition of hands. They are then introduced to the study of clairvoyance and seeing at a distance; and finally to that of rendering visible the spirits of those who have passed away, especially of the elders by whom they have been initiated. Jounouseof said that he had had interviews with his own deceased master as palpably as when he was in the natural body. They were taught that to retain constantly the distinctive qualities of a Muridist, the disciple must persistently live a life of sobriety and disinterestedness; must pray without ceasing, and heal the sick."

"He said that their science was secret; that they made no boast of, nor worldly gain by it, and that they are held in great esteem in Bokhara and throughout Central Asia."

"What I told him about modern Spiritualism interested him much. I presented him with Russian translations of two of Allan Kardec's smaller works, which he said he would render into Arabic and Persian, and he requested me to interchange with him, from time to time, news of progress in our several countries."

THE C. A. S.—The Council will meet at 38, Great Russell-street, on Tuesday evening next. It is highly desirable that there should be a full attendance of members.

The Christian Globe "reviewer" makes a curious mistake in referring to Mr. Drummond's work, "Natural Law in the Spiritual World." He says:—"For our own part we are fairly sick of the spirits and their professors, and have nothing but contempt for the sorry devices, subterfuges, and monkey-tricks resorted to by those ethereal gases in the realm of balderdash known as the spirit-world." Passing by the cheap sneer at Spiritualism as of no account we fail to see what connection there is between Spiritualism and the book in question. The subject is not even mentioned or hinted at, and the "reviewer" appears to have simply jumped at the conclusion that the book dealt with psychological subjects by reason of its title. Probably he knows just as much about Spiritualism, and that is why we pass by his sneer without comment. We make him a present of the situation for what it is worth.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[It is preferable that correspondents should append their names and addresses to communications. In any case, however, these must be supplied to the Editor as a guarantee of good faith.]

Esoteric Buddhism.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—May I be allowed to say some words once more upon the subject of Esoteric Buddhism. Having left England for India on August 25th, I have been unable to keep in rapport with the discussion while it lasted, and to communicate with you at a time perhaps more suitable than the present.

I am enabled to write in answer to your Spiritualistic correspondents, because I am in sympathy with all honest Spiritualists and am a corresponding member of the Central Association in London. While acknowledging, however, the phenomena of Spiritualism to be scientific, I have been enabled by some study to see their rationale, and to rise to Esoteric Truth, which masters of Occultism and Theosophists can understand.

Well, then, I proceed now to offer some resistance to the attacks of your contributors and of the journalists of London generally.

I refer first to an opinion expressed in regard to the erudition of Rhys Davids as opposed to that of our President-Founder. It would not be real modesty to refrain from asserting that no one with so-called normal powers can know nearly so much of Buddhism as the prominent members of the Theosophical Society.

I now proceed, sir, to deal with some contributions to the paper under your editorial direction. In answer to them generally, it may be said that we expect, and are prepared for, the scepticism, of which we have recently had a sample. It would be vain to expect other things from those who have eyes yet do not see. The doubting of the existence of the Occult Brethren is a matter which, in the real Theosophist, provokes a quiet laugh. The speaking disparagingly raises feelings of indignation and of pity. Accepted Chelas, of whom there are many in this Empire and four of whom I have the honour of knowing personally, are in constant communication with their masters, have seen them frequently in both ordinary and to us extraordinary circumstances, and know them as they know their own souls. The statement that "the Brothers" are not seen is, indeed, absurd and untrue.

And now I proceed to notice particularly the letter of one of your correspondents, Mr. Henry Kiddle. Mr. Kiddle's letter is written conscientiously and in a good spirit: and there is no doubt but that, from an ordinary standpoint, there is fair reason for the protest with which we have been favoured.

Mr. Kiddle, "not to put too fine a point upon it," accuses one of our respected masters of nothing short of plagiarism. Mr. Kiddle will not, I am sure, maintain that the ideas in his excerpts are original and are placed by him for the first time before an attentive world. Our master puts the same ideas before us (in pretty much the same words, it is true), but refers, beforehand, to a gentleman of the name of Plato. The sentences to which Mr. Kiddle lays claim are found among a number of others bearing on the subject, but the latter are not, so far as we have heard, to be found in any discourse delivered at Mount Pleasant or elsewhere. Whence come they? is the query which arises.

We will not answer Mr. Kiddle by saying, in the words of Solomon, that there is nothing new under the sun; but will tell him, instead, that the explanation is occult, and deals with an essence known as "astral light." Our master has, no doubt, seen the idea, and, being tired (as indicated at the close of the paragraph referred to), has written or impressed it hurriedly without regard to the feelings of Mr. Kiddle on the one hand or of Plato on the other.

To us who are within the pale, it is unpleasant to write letters of a nature such as this, in answer to unsympathetic and sceptical men. But as time goes on it will be recognised (though we say it, perhaps, who should not) that an explanation such as this is good-natured; for the absence of knowledge on the part of Mr. Kiddle is assuredly his loss—not ours.—I am, Sir, yours truly,

Esoteric Buddhism.

SIR,—As you have expressed your intention to close your columns on this subject, I should not—having the fear of your waste paper basket before me—have ventured to address you, but the controversy is so manifestly unfair that I cannot see it and remain quiet. Your theosophical correspondents, one and all, gird at "G. W." as if he were the only seceder from amongst them; such, however, is not the case, as when Mr. Harrychund Chintamon, on behalf of the Arya Somaj, invited Colonel Olcott to Bombay to found a Spiritual Society, Mr. Chintamon could not agree with some of the doctrines or rules put forward by Colonel Olcott, either from his own intuition or under the inspiration of his guiding star; consequently he declined to have anything more to do with the founders, and the Colonel, therefore, after the manner of his countrymen, took the matter into his own hands, and "bossed the job" himself. The secession of Mr. Chintamon was shortly after followed by that of Mr. Wainbridge and Miss Bator, who accompanied the Colonel and Madame Blavatsky from New York. The letters that have appeared in the Bombay newspapers shewing that while wine and tobacco are not allowed their disciples, the founders partake of them freely, are a curious commentary.

As regards Koot Hoomi and the Himalayan Brothers, it is remarkable that they were unknown to such a learned and accomplished native gentleman as Mr. Chintamon. If, therefore, "G. W." has got tired of the "shut your eyes and open your mouth" system it is not to be wondered at; indeed the wonder is it should have lasted so long with him,

Organisation.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Mr. Jackson may be interested to learn that there is no intention of abandoning all attempt at organisation in this country. Whether my arguments, which Mr. Jackson is good enough to notice, are or are not sound, we propose to act on his motto, "Try! try! try again!" I agree with him that such is our duty. We shall discharge that duty none the worse if we review the past and endeavour to trace the causes of failure hitherto. That which Mr. Jackson points to as chiefly operative in America—the plague-spot of Free Love—is quite inoperative here. We have been mercifully preserved from that curse. So that there must be other reasons for want of success. If Mr. Jackson will re-read my Notes, I think he will see that I have indicated some of them. But, be this as it may, I believe that the time will come when it will be possible to frame a powerful organisation in Spiritualism, correlated with similar organisations in other countries. I should like to see a great Brotherhood among Spiritualists of all nations, embracing every different variety of faith, fettered by no hard and fast creed, but banded together for the maintenance and defence of that faith which is their common property. I hope to see that dream an accomplished fact. I shall not defer the happy day if I keep before my mind a clear view of the difficulties in the way of its realisation.

How far distant the day may be none can tell. Events move very rapidly now, and we can but proceed experimentally until we do succeed.

To this end it is very desirable that they who are doing similar work in different countries should hold communication with each other. I shall be glad to hear from any friends in America, who are desirous of co-operating with me and others here in England in making organisation an accomplished fact.

Our aim should be simple. We should avoid any interference with existing societies, or any attempt at indiscriminate proselytism. The simpler our bond of union the better it will hold.

If any who favour this plan, whether in this country or elsewhere, will address me at the office of this Journal, I shall be happy to give their suggestions every consideration.

Mr. Ware on Progress.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Mr. Charles Ware, in his letter which appeared in your issue of October 13th, is much disturbed because "in religious thought and spiritual knowledge there is absolutely no progress, but utter stagnation." This would be sad and discouraging indeed if it were true, but it is not true. There is immense progress in every direction outside Spiritualistic circles. It is true that creeds remain stationary, but this is no proof of stagnation, for opinions do not so remain. What used to be called "orthodox" fifty years ago, within my memory, is, to a great extent, abandoned, and broader and more rational ideas are struggling into recognition. The orthodox "hell" has received wonderful modifications. "Eternal torture" is quickly becoming obsolete. Salvation by faith alone is fast losing its hold upon people's minds, and pulpit discourses are becoming more and more practical. There was never so much effort made towards Prayer-book reform and the disuse of the Athanasian Creed as of late years. With regard to the future state, I have been surprised to hear eminent members of the various denominations discourse of the spiritual world and its realities with almost as much intelligence as a Spiritualist would, while at the same time I know that they were not readers of our literature. There seems to be an influx into the human mind generally, bringing men into a state of greater preparedness for the reception of spiritual truth. All this is what we might expect; and it is accompanied with an increase of forbearance and toleration which is most striking. The violent prejudice which spiritual facts used to encounter has sensibly given way. But the change is seen in other directions. Fifty years ago a clergyman who could advocate from the pulpit the admission of Dissenting ministers to Church of England pulpits would have called down upon him the censure of his bishop, and have imperilled his position. Now, a canon is able to counsel the same innovations from a cathedral pulpit without exciting much surprise, as was done the other day at Bristol. Look at Oxford. I can remember it as the home of narrowness, bigotry, and the most arrogant intolerance. A Dissenter was a low caste wretch who scarcely dared lift up his head in the University. But now all is changed! Nonconformists are admitted to tutorships and fellowships; the clergy are being ousted from the headships of colleges; and five heads of houses are already laymen! One of the "heretical" writers of "Essays and Reviews" has just served his term of office as Vice-Chancellor, and has now been re-elected for another year—an unusual honour. Dissenters take their place on an equality with Churchmen. Indeed, one may almost say that it is rather a recommendation than otherwise not to be a Churchman. Thus a wide door is open for the diffusion of new and more liberal ideas among the great body of the clergy and others.

With such results as these before us, and many others which might be mentioned, but are obvious enough to those who will look for them, it is strange to hear it said, "there is absolutely no progress, but utter stagnation."

There is one other thing I would like to notice. Mr. Ware compares the book of nature with the "volume of ancient writings which we all have on our shelf" (I suppose the Bible), which he seems to hold in contempt, for he exalts the former at the expense of the latter. But I cannot see the sense of comparing two things so essentially different. It is as if one should say, "'Paradise Lost' is rather a childish book, with but little poetry in it, but for my own part I prefer the view from the right." The Scriptures were not written in order to expound the "book of nature," or to teach us natural science, or even history. They are full of spiritual lessons taught by symbol, intended to aid in the regeneration of the soul. "Nature" indeed abounds with instruction, but inasmuch as the spirit is of far higher importance than the body, interesting as that is, and the spiritual world than the natural world, so the Scriptures must logically be of far more importance than the "book of nature."

To estimate the Bible as the "crude thoughts of infancy," or as the "story books of the nursery," as compared with nature, indicates rather a curious want of appreciation of spiritual things.

Transition of Mr. John Beattie.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—An old and earnest Spiritualist, Mr. John Beattie, of Clifton, passed away on the 14th October, in his sixty-third year. Born of the artisan class, but extremely fond of study, I found him twenty-five years ago a prominent photographer, and no mean metaphysician of the materialistic school. In 1864 the Davenport Brothers having come to Clifton, I met him at their exhibition, and we both agreed that the subject demanded further investigation. Shortly after, Mrs. Mary Marshall was engaged to come to Bristol, and through her then marvellous mediumship, with many others in Clifton and Bristol, both he and I became convinced of the immortality of man and of the communion with the spirit world. From that time he assiduously followed up the study of our philosophy, and with word and pen made numerous converts among the Secularists, of whom he had previously been a prominent member. By nature he was most humane, but since his conversion to Spiritualism he became a great philanthropist, and on my visiting him a few weeks only before his demise I found him an example of cheerful resignation, under the infliction of paralysis, which prevented him following his usual active life. His memory will ever be cherished by all those who knew him.—Respectfully yours,

G. DAMIANI.

Physical Manifestation.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—About twelve months ago I furnished you with my experience of the folly of attempting to get satisfactory physical manifestations in promiscuous or crowded circles. That experience has recently been confirmed. On Saturday evening last, Mr. John Taylor, at the instigation of the Rochdale Spiritualists' Society, gave a séance in their meeting room, which proved unsatisfactory with the exception of the tilting of the table. After the meeting I suggested to a friend, Mr. Lewis Firth, that we should have a private sitting at his house on Sunday morning. The hint was taken and a circle of eight persons, including the medium, met at 11 a.m. Six of the sitters were Spiritualists and two were gentlemen who, for a better term, I will call sceptics, as both had heard something of Spiritualism, but neither sufficient to warrant affirmation either one way or another. We had sat in partial darkness about half an hour when the manifestations commenced by the twisting of the table on the floor. After the lapse of a few minutes the table began to tilt, when all of a sudden it rose bodily from the floor, our hands, of course, upon it. By-and-bye the medium raised his hands, bringing them violently down upon the table, which rose three times in succession. The next thing was the raising of the table under our hands and remaining about five seconds suspended as if by attraction to them. Now the signal was given for one of our investigating friends to get upon the table and stand on the medium's hands. This done the table rose bodily from the floor with its living freight upon it. A stool was now called for, which the medium placed firmly on the table, and after taking hold of two of the legs, half way between the seat and the bottom, all rose, the table following the stool. The next feat was that of the medium placing his hands on the top of the stool—still on the table—and all together rising, the table and stool holding together and following the medium's hands.

We considered the manifestations of the most satisfactory character, for Mr. Taylor was not in his usual good health, suffering from the effects of a crash or fall he had whilst at his work a few weeks ago.—Yours truly,

PETER LEE

Professor Denton.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

DEAR SIR,—Referring to the paragraph in last issue of LIGHT, on the "Transition of Professor Denton," founded on a telegram to the Boston Herald, I may inform you that throughout June that gentleman was lecturing in Queensland, and visiting and reporting on some of its northern gold and tin mines. He and his sons then joined Captain Armit, the special correspondent of the Melbourne Argus, whose proprietors have fitted out and despatched a party for the exploration of New Guinea, leaving Cooktown, Northern Queensland, for thence at the beginning of July. By telegram from Port Moresby, New Guinea, dated July 28th, we learn the party arrived there safely on the 10th, leaving on the 14th with a number of native carriers, and were then at the back of Mount Astrolake, twenty miles E. N. E. from Port Moresby.

A few weeks since a short telegram from Cooktown appeared in the English papers, stating that fever had compelled the return of the Argus party to Cooktown, Professor Denton (printed Benton) being one of the victims. Whether he has succumbed to the fever or not I know not as yet; I earnestly hope he has not. The mail this month is unfortunately a week late, so I have not received any papers of later date than August 6th.

If not a victim of the Java catastrophe, he may have fallen a victim to New Guinea fever, whose coast country is fearfully malarious.

Yours faithfully,

J. BOWRING SLOMAN.

"Astrology."

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Like the bellows-blower to the organist, your readers will no doubt thank me for the interesting communication from your esteemed correspondent "C. C. M."

I should have acknowledged my indebtedness for his kindness in so promptly complying with my request, but have been out of town for the last few weeks and only just returned.

Shortly put, "C. C. M.'s" conclusions seem to be that there is something in Astrology, but how much, he is not at present prepared to say.

As regards the something, perhaps it might not be uninteresting to have the opinion of one on "the other side" on the subject, which I give as received:—

"Saturday, September 29th, 1877.

"I am come again to speak with you on a subject most interesting to me and I think very interesting to you also. I have considered the bearing of the planets and fixed stars upon human destiny, and do not find that they influence it in any appreciable degree; all they do is to indicate the influence prevailing at the moment of birth, but they in no way affect the child other than as I have said. For instance, a child born at the time of the vernal equinox would be ushered into life at a time when great commotion in the elements or atmosphere caused by heat would be surrounding it, and it would consequently partake of this character and be more or less of a choleric disposition; and if, from parental causes of bias, that child were predisposed that way, the result would be a hot and fiery temper, but if such child were weakly and was born with opposite tendencies from its parents, it would of course be affected in only a very slight degree. Thus, you see they have an effect, but only in a very minor degree and exercise no influence on the future life except in the way I have stated, that is; if a person born, as I have said, at the vernal equinoxial period is, at that time (the recurring period), engaged upon anything that causes him to lose his temper, he would be more violent probably than at another time, but you see that would depend on the accident of his being annoyed at that particular time.

"I think I have said all I need say on this subject, as although it has a certain fascination about it, it is only when it leads up, and beyond, to the spiritual idea, that it is of any value, and then only to the individual student."

If not trespassing too much on the valuable time and good nature of "C. C. M." perhaps he would say how far these views accord with his own.

WALSALL SPIRITUALISTS' SOCIETY.

On Monday last the above society held a tea meeting and entertainment in the Exchange Rooms, High-street, for the purpose of giving a public reception to Mr. and Mrs. Wallis. There was a goodly attendance.

After tea, the President of the society (Mr. W. Washbourne) addressed the meeting. He said: It is with the greatest degree of pleasure and gratitude that I address you at this meeting, because it will record an event in the history of our movement which many of us have longed for and heartily desired, namely, to have our light continually burning through the instrumentality and ability of our respected friends and co-workers, Mr. and Mrs. Wallis. When we remember the smallness of our numbers and the feebleness of our powers, it is a cause of deep gratitude and thankfulness that we, with all our weakness and inability, have been able to face the tide of opposition, misrepresentation, calumny, and slander heaped upon us by those who, if they had investigated before they condemned, would have manifested a more Christian spirit, especially when we remember that the proclamation of the truth in the past led to the Cross, the faggot, and the prophet's doom. Some fourteen years ago two friends from Wolverhampton were invited to a séance, with a few Walsall friends, at Mr. Blinkhorn's, in Stafford-street. The hand of the lady from Wolverhampton was moved to draw pictures on a sheet of paper with great rapidity while she was engaged talking to us, and seemed to be paying no attention to what was going on—not looking at her hand at all. In a short time the paper was covered with a farmyard scene. We were informed that a spirit controlled her hand and performed that. "Well," thought I, "perhaps it did, and perhaps it did not." I thought, "It may be the result of practice." Again, I could not see any reason why she should deceive us, seeing she bore her own expenses, in visiting us. During this time Sarah Blinkhorn seemed in a semi-unconscious state, and continued so for hours. She was very sensitive, and could explain the motions of persons behind her back; this I considered mesmerism. But, determined to see more of it, I attended sances for about seven or eight years, and, with others, watched with the greatest attention, and from what I saw and heard I could come to no other conclusion than this: that the spirits of good and bad men live, move and act as intelligent beings after so-called death. I feel as sure of this as I am of my own existence at this moment. I do not know what others feel about this knowledge; I think it worth a lifetime of searching for—worth living for. This sentiment is felt no doubt by others in this room. Several I see present resolved to form a society on July 9th, 1872, for the purpose of further investigation into these strange phenomena. There, in a private room, among our nearest and dearest friends, each one anxious to arrive at the truth, we received such clear evidences of spirit-presence and identity that we were convinced beyond all doubt that our dear ones live on, and, under certain conditions, are able to manifest their presence and prove their identity. The joy and pleasure we experienced on several occasions at these glad re-unions is indescribable; they were the happiest moments of our lives. And, so far as I remember, without such a terrible thing as a paid medium; so, if we were fools we were not fooled. Not that we object to paid mediums—we say any man, whoever he may be, who devotes his time and talents to the services and well-being of his fellows is worthy of his hire. After continuing our meetings in George-street for some time, we, on February 9th, 1877, resolved to take these rooms. We felt so pleased with the discovery we had made that we determined to bring the matter before the public, so far as our ability and means would allow. We engaged trance and inspirational mediums, as well as the free services of Mrs. Groom, Mrs. Barr, Mr. Harper, and others. I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without saying a word about our secretary. He has worked for several years with such great perseverance, industry, and ability that to a great extent the present condition of the society is due to him. Further, allow me to remind you of the steady growth and prosperity of our society. At the end of the first year of our existence our receipts and expenditure were about £14. At our last annual report the income was £84, and the expenditure £30. If this shows anything it looks as plain as two and two making four that we are going forward, and if our society should die we know that truth can never die, but will diffuse itself into the religion of the future, and make men's ideas of God, immortality, and duty more true, rational, and beautiful. It is that these truths may be proclaimed more fully to the people, to feed the heart-hungry, gladden the mourners, and strengthen the weary workers and reformers that we have invited our friends, Mr. and Mrs. Wallis, to exercise their gifts and talents among us. We believe them both to be upright and honest, and what they profess to be; that they are mediums of no mean order we know. Mr. Wallis has been at our services many times during the last seven years; he has travelled more or less all over England and in America, and as we have never heard anything against his character, we regard him as well qualified to regularly fill our platform. We believe his college was the séance room and his teachers the angelhood, and we have the word of a very respectable person in Walsall, who has known him many years, and speaks very highly of him. Mrs. Wallis we have not known so long, but she has already taken our platform twice, giving excellent addresses, and we would earnestly ask you to listen to her and give her your sympathy and presence at the first opportunity. To you, Mr. and Mrs. Wallis, in the name of the Walsall Spiritualists' Society, I give hearty and cordial welcome to your new sphere of labour, and I trust that the feeling of friendship now existing between you and the Walsall Spiritualists may continue, and grow and ripen as time rolls on; and if you should by any means have to leave us, that the good wishes we now have towards both of you may be firmer and truer at the end than at the beginning is my earnest wish.

Messrs. Bailey, Armfield, Smith, and Groom, and Mrs. Groom (of Birmingham) and Mrs. Roberts delivered short speeches of welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Wallis, and of reference to the spread of Spiritualism in the town; after which the following resolution was passed with acclamation, proposed by Mr. Smith and seconded by Mr. Allaop:—"Resolved, that in the opinion of this meeting Mr. and Mrs. Wallis are fit and proper persons, well qualified, to represent the Spiritualists of Walsall as their regular speakers, and hereby tender them hearty welcome and promise of warmest sympathy and support."

Mr. Wallis then took the chair and ably conducted the entertainment, which consisted of instrumental and vocal music and recitations, all of which were creditably rendered by the ladies and gentlemen who took part therein, and were much appreciated by the audience.

To-morrow (Sunday) Mr. Wallis will speak at 6.30 p.m.; subject, "Life: its importance considered from a spiritual standpoint."

T. P. Barkas, Esq., F.G.S., has recently been elected an alderman of the city of Newcastle-on-Tyne. The worthy gentleman has been in the City Council for many years as one of the representatives of St. Andrew's South Ward.

COLONEL OLCOTT ON THE KIDDLE PLAGIARISM.

It is desirable that anything I may wish to say in reply to the letter of Colonel Olcott, which appears in another column, should be said at once. For to a vast majority of the readers of "LIGHT" it seems that "a little more than a little" more of this discussion "is by much too much." It is dry and fruitless, and desperately profitless. But the President-Founder of the Theosophical Society speaks with authority, and anything from his pen is worthy of attention. I, at least, always lend an attentive ear to his words, for I entirely reciprocate the friendly feelings that he, I am sure, entertains towards me; and did I know nothing more of him than his blameless and self-sacrificing life, spent literally in going about doing good, in healing all manner of sickness and disease, I should feel deep respect for that faith of his, which can inspire such works of beneficence. The man who gives up all that this world has to bestow—home, and kindred, and friends, and profession—and goes forth with unquestioning faith to promulgate what he believes to be the truth, is a man who commands the respect of every worthy critic. On all grounds I willingly listen to Colonel Olcott.

But I am a little puzzled to know what I have done. Unless Colonel Olcott, through hasty reading, has confounded in my Note my own words with an extract from the St. James's Gazette, of which I was rather making fun and with the spirit of which I have no sort of sympathy, I must say he seems to me extremely sensitive and thin-skinned. And this is a quality which strikes me as being very pronounced in Theosophical utterances. It would seem that Theosophists are so little sure of their ground as to be very sensitive to the most kindly criticism, even so far as to resort to dogmatic utterance to avoid it. I have refrained for a long time from expressing any opinion about moot matters between Theosophists and Spiritualists. In the midst of much that was eminently provocative both respecting Christianity and Spiritualism, I maintained a perfectly good-humoured silence. For I was quite convinced that the superior knowledge which could put forward Bradlaugh as an antidote to Christianity, or discourse as their accredited organ, the Theosophist, did not infrequently about Spiritualism, was not a thing to be taken seriously. As Colonel Olcott says about me and Koot Hoomi, "I permitted myself" to smile, and I have continued to permit myself that amusement ever since. That, surely, hurt nobody. A consciousness of rectitude might ignore that. But when I make a very mild and jesting allusion to Mr. Kiddle's allegation, I find the President-Founder down on me with all his big guns, ignoring anything I may have done to secure a fair hearing for his beliefs; and I learn, to my surprise, that I am considered by him, and by others of my Theosophical friends, to have dealt in "sneers, innuendoes," and so forth. By no means, my good friends. I do not wish to sneer. I do not deal in innuendoes. If I mean a thing I am apt to say it. But since I am publicly taken to task respecting what I should have imagined, from the way in which it has been treated, that Colonel Olcott considered an insignificant matter—indeed, he expressly says of it that it is "fit only for children"—I have no hesitation in expressing my opinion that it is, on the contrary, a very serious matter, eminently worthy of the best attention that Colonel Olcott can bestow upon it. I only regret that it has not been seriously dealt with hitherto; and that, with an exception hereafter to be made, it is not so treated now.

What Colonel Olcott regards as "a few unquoted and unimportant sentences," I am bound to say I regard far otherwise. Though I am fully aware of the various cases of plagiarism which he alludes to, and of others besides, in which the bona fides of the scribe is quite unquestioned, as, emphatically, it is in this case, it has never yet occurred, I think, to any Spiritualist to attempt to pass off such cases as unimportant. We by no means ignore their existence or their significance. We do not refer them to fraud on the part of the medium; on the contrary, they have been regarded by us as evidencing the action of an unseen intelligence, the moral consciousness of which was not of a high order. We should be startled at the presence of such plagiarism in one who posed before us as a great moral regenerator and instructor, and on behalf of whom such tremendous claims were made, as are now made, on behalf of the Mahatmas.

Nor am I at all clear how far the action of what is, unquestionably, an occult law in the communion between us and the unseen world, applies to the present case. I can accept, for there is the evidence of it, even if I cannot understand, the transference of thought, the identity of utterance even, which reproduces an idea, or a specially apt term of expression, or a telling argument—though I think in borrowing from another person most writers would feel bound to acknowledge the obligation in some way or other. The cases which Colonel Olcott gives are extremely striking, and should command the serious attention of all unprejudiced investigators of the subject now under discussion. But these ideas of Mr. Kiddle's have not been merely transfused; they have been ingeniously perverted, distorted from their original intention, and, by the deliberate omission of inconvenient words and phrases, have been made to do duty for a purpose very different from that for which they were first intended. This, surely, differentiates the case under notice from others quoted by Colonel Olcott.

But, feeling as I do strongly our ignorance of occult laws, I should have adopted in respect of this new difficulty the tactics with which I have met so many others, had it not been that the case as a difficulty does not stand alone. I speak with some authority here, for I have followed from its very earliest conception the history of that which from small beginnings has now developed into a very portentous claim. It was some time before we heard of any Brothers at all. When we did they were spoken of quite simply as Himalayan Brothers, and we got at no facts about them. Then they became Adept Brothers, and we heard of their marvellous occult powers. But it is not till very recently that they have been spoken of with bated breath and bended knee as the Mahatmas, and lack of such reverence on our part has come to be regarded as blasphemous. This is very perplexing, and really, in the light of what "G. W., M. D." tells us of his futile attempts to get at them, first through one "perfectly holy man," and then through another "almost Divine in wisdom, power, and holiness," both of whom turned out badly, it is provocative of one of the smiles that I still "permit myself." It may be that all this is on the lines of legitimate development, that these mysterious beings are all that is claimed for them now by their most enthusiastic devotees. It is impossible to prove a negative. But if they be so holy, at least they are not wise. If they be wise according to their own judgment, at least they have taken some steps with regard to us that are hardly consonant with our ideas of advanced holiness. So long as they were enwrapped in isolation, we could say nothing. When they meddle with us, through an intermediary agency, we are entitled to criticise their methods of action. And this criticism, however lenient, must be adverse to the claims advanced. There is no perceptible ground for accepting what is dogmatically forced upon us as an article of faith.

I have said that this Kiddle plagiarism is not an isolated case of difficulty. Since Colonel Olcott challenges me because I attach importance—in common, I may say parenthetically, with every person with whom I have conversed on the subject—to what he thinks "fit only for children," I reply, first that it is a fact—an oasis in the midst of a desert of speculative theory. And secondly, I say that, until it is fairly met, it is to the mind of most men an ugly fact. Here I give full credit for what Colonel Olcott adduces as evidence of the working of an occult law of which this may be an instance. But no such explanation will apply to the claim made from the same source that I myself had, without knowing it, been all these years in communication with, and under the inspiration of, these Brothers, of whom "Imperator" was claimed as one. Now, I had been, as any who has read my "Spirit Teachings" will know, extremely careful as to what I did. The records of all these years were most carefully kept, and many a query was put and answered respecting these mysterious Brothers. The result was the same always. The reply was that of the converts of whom it was inquired whether they had received the gift of the Holy Ghost. "We do not so much as know whether there be any Holy Ghost." Any knowledge of the very existence of such a Brotherhood was invariably disclaimed. When, then, I found that "Imperator" was claimed as a brother, and I as an unwitting disciple—I who had made secure every step of my onward progress!—I regarded it as a very serious matter. For many years I had searched for a fact. When I got one, it dissipated many theories.

It would be fruitless to prolong this controversy. Whether it be "fit only for children" or, as I rather think, of very serious import, no good can be got by prolonged discussion. I have exercised a patience of which I am not ashamed. I have always given credit to Theosophical teachings for the recognition of the powers of the incarnate human spirit which Spiritualists are too apt to ignore. I have done what in me lay to secure a fair hearing for the claims put forward. If now I am compelled to say the evidence does not satisfy me, I am ready also to admit that it does apparently satisfy some who are fully able and have full materials on which to judge for themselves. I have no wish to bias any man. I should have gone on my own way, with a hearty respect for those with whom I cannot agree—for I am sure that their motives are as pure as my own, and I do not expect to live to see the day when we shall all see eye to eye—were it not that Colonel Olcott, hastily I cannot but think, accused me of unfairness and precipitancy, where I have been scrupulously patient and impartial. It is, I know, quite vain to represent to those who have arrived at a position of unquestioning faith in the wisdom and absolute knowledge of these Brothers that they are in error in face of the facts. I have felt inclined to say repeatedly to them as Cromwell once said to an assembly of Scotch divines: "I entreat you by the mercies of God to remember that it is possible that sometimes you may be mistaken." But the dogmatic assertion: "It is impossible that the Brothers should be mistaken about anything," removes everything from the realm of discussion into that atmosphere of infallible authority which is indifferently well adapted as an environment to the Supreme Pontiff, but is only ludicrous in an imitator. And so, cadit questio.

SINGULAR COINCIDENCE.

The late Mr. Ward, a well-known solicitor, of Newcastle-under-Lyme, told my informant that when he was a young man he was walking with two young ladies in Cheadle churchyard up and down the centre walk. As they passed the church, some boys were playing on a tombstone touching the wall of the church, and resting upright against the church was a large, heavy stone slab. The sight of the boys playing on the tomb distressed Mr. Ward, as an apparent irreverence, and in order to put a stop to it, without the least apprehension of such a thing being really likely to happen, he said, "Come away, boys, from that tomb, or that great heavy stone may fall on you and kill you." The boys scuttled off at once, and almost before Mr. Ward could turn away, the great upright stone, to his intense astonishment, fell down on the flat tomb just where the children had been a moment before. He said he never should forget the impression it made on him.

Those who believe in the power of spirits to impress persons of a sensitive constitution with thoughts or inclination to action may suppose that a friendly spirit, foreseeing the impending fall of the slab, impressed the mind of Mr. Ward with the feeling of irreverence, and suggested to him the means he adopted to get the boys away.

REVIEWS.

II.—WILLIAM HOWITT.

William Howitt was conspicuously a many-sided man. In the course of a life, long in years, and longer still in the measure of the work accomplished in it, he played many parts, and played them all well, with a thoroughness characteristic of his nature, and with a vigour all his own. It is fortunate that our space is not taxed to present any adequate idea of his life-work. In this place we have to deal only with William Howitt, the Spiritualist: and, even with this limitation, we can but indicate some of the results at which he arrived. We must often be content merely with acting as guide to the many good things gathered by his daughter within this reverent memoir.

"So various," says the author, "were his literary labours, so incessant his mental and physical activity, that I feel embarrassed by the very richness of the material before me. Fully to depict this man, who during the last twenty years of his long life came forth prominently as the champion and apostle of a new, and, consequently, unpopular truth—my special object in writing this memorial—a championship and apostleship which, in the sight of an unsympathetic world, throw their shadow, rather than their light, upon his previous reputation and works—it will be needful to name these various works, and to briefly explain their character."

Confining ourselves, however, to his special writings, we find the mere enumeration of them filling some pages. From the time when in the year 1858, he began to contribute to the British Spiritual Telegraph, (published at Keighley, in Yorkshire), down to the time when, living in Italy, he was to a great extent withdrawn from public Spiritualism, then in a new phase of its development, he was an unwearied and trenchant defender of his faith as a Spiritualist. His had been the task to elevate matter to the plane of spirit, to vindicate Spiritualism as the handmaid of Christianity, to point to the new revelation of the power of the Divine Spirit, whereby "God left Himself not without witness among men." He saw, or thought he saw a disorderly element dominating what had seemed to him the orderly sequence of a Divine plan. The new phase—sufficiently typified by the materialisation of the full form—was to him repellent. It was the dragging down of spirit to the plane of matter, the reversal of the process congenial to his taste. He had done his work nobly and well: it was not to be expected, perhaps it was not to be desired, that he should enter into a new sphere of thought, or attempt to adapt himself, at an age when the mental processes have necessarily lost something of their flexibility, to a changed order of things. We entertain no doubt that the work allotted him was completed, when, in the full fitness of things, he entered into the fruition of it. To no labourer could more appropriately be applied the Benediction of Peace—"Well done good and faithful servant! Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord!"

Howitt's Varied Experiences.

If it be impossible for a Reviewer to enumerate his writings, it is equally hopeless to attempt a detailed account of the varied experiences recorded in this volume.

He was associated with all the known writers and experts in the subject of Spiritualism. William and Garth Wilkinson, Robert Chambers, Professor and Mrs. De Morgan, Mr. and Mrs. S. C. Hall, Mr. and Mrs. Newton Crosland, Mr. and Mrs. Alaric Watts, Mr. and Mrs. Nenner, Dr. Doherty, Dr. Ashburner, Dale Owen, Benjamin Coleman, and, not to particularise too minutely, the Rev. James Smith, a man who eminently deserves a place among the Pioneers.

In the course of the narrative we find him witnessing the phenomena of some phase of Spiritualism with such well-known mediums as D. D. Home, Charles Foster, the Davenport, and the Seerss (L.M.), to whom one portion of the book is appropriately inscribed. He was present when the Rev. T. Lake Harris, then in the plenitude of his power, electrified London by his sermons, and when Emma Hardinge delivered the remarkable series of inspirational addresses with which the name of Mr. Coleman is associated as chairman of her meetings.

We shall best discharge, with due regard to exigencies of space, the duty laid upon us, if we indicate some among William Howitt's many experiences, and refer our readers to the record of them.

Mesmerism.

His first acquaintance with the mesmeric phenomena was made at Heidelberg, through Dr. Spencer Hall, who also had the privilege of introducing the subject to another distinguished Spiritualist, Alfred R. Wallace. Dr. Hall had sent to him a newspaper report of a lecture on mesmerism: and Mr. Howitt had written to warn him to let the unpopular subject alone. The narrative is thus continued:—

"The same day that I wrote this letter, there presented himself in the evening a young American, who, having overworked himself at Harvard College, was now travelling in Europe for his health, en route for the East. I placed the newspaper in his hand, asking him what he thought of Hall's lecture. Having read it very deliberately, he said, to my great astonishment, that the whole was perfectly true, and that he himself possessed some mesmeric power. As several other friends were coming that evening to us, we requested him after tea to make a trial of his power. He consented. He first experimented upon a German gentleman, the tutor of our sons. Mr. Wheeler, the American, had not made many 'passes' over our German friend, before he cried, vehemently, 'Take me out of this! take me out of this! I am being frozen to death!' The operator stopped, and finding the young gentleman actually trembling with cold, we at once gave him some wine and roused up the fire in the stove. This, however, did not fully restore the young man to his usual temperature; nor, indeed, did he fully regain it throughout the evening. Notwithstanding this strange effect, a lady, a strong, healthy, high-spirited woman, a cousin of my wife's, proposed to sit down next, and have 'passes' made over her. The effect produced was exactly the same, and it was as difficult to restore her natural warmth as it had been in the case of the young German. She cried out that she was perishing with cold, and it seemed impossible to conquer the chill from which she suffered. Our American friend expressed much astonishment. Such an experience was entirely new to him. It was evident, however, that the mesmeric force was a very powerful and formidable one. Mr. Wheeler took his leave of us that evening, saying that he started the next morning on his journey towards Syria. Within ten days after this we were shocked to learn that he had proceeded no farther than Darmstadt, a stage but of a few hours, where he had died of a rapid consumption! This threw a curious light over his mesmeric operations. Death was already in him, and the deficiency of his life-power in his mesmeric passes was rapidly drawing away that of his patients."

"The cold they felt was really the cold of death, proceeding from the already well-nigh dead man!"

Automatic Writing and Drawing.

One of the most interesting chapters is that (pp. 261 to 272), which records Mr. Howitt's personal experiences in Automatic Communications. Mr. and Mrs. Howitt had been to see the beautiful spirit-drawings of Mrs. W. Wilkinson, an account of which is given in Mr. Wilkinson's "Spirit-drawings: a Personal Narrative." As so frequently occurs, they had brought away with them some of the spirit-power; and when each, unknown to the other, essayed to get some such form of communication, Mr. Howitt soon found "something resembling an electric shock through his arm and hand." The pencil began to move in circles, and finally traced upon the paper in large, strongly-formed characters—some as if printed, others adorned with scroll work—a short message. The communications automatically given began on February 8th, and ceased on July 30th, 1858. They were obtained under conditions precisely similar to those under which others have obtained like results. It is a point well worthy of careful notice that these abnormal displays of spirit-power are manifested with a strict adherence to law, under the most diverse circumstances, and through the most dissimilar mediums.

Whilst Mr. Howitt was developing Automatic Writing, Mrs. Howitt's experiment was no less successful in the direction of Automatic Drawing.* The account of this first trial is worth study.

"Sitting with her hand passively holding the pencil, it gently commenced automatically to trace a crocus-shaped flower with a bulbous root. After which came several other flowers delicately traced. She repeated the experiment; the power increasing. Within a short time a still more striking thing occurred. Whilst automatically drawing a bell-like flower, she perceived, lying upon the blank paper, the most delicately outlined and shaded butterfly, appearing as if it were sketched in sepia; the minute veining of the wings, and their spots delicately delineated, as if made of the finest lace. Upon the second half of the sheet is an explanation, written by his hand, guided spiritually. These explanations appear without any alteration or confusion of expression. Their character is always pious, sometimes devotional, sometimes didactic, frequently very graceful in expression and idea. These writings shew the nature of the designs to be symbolical, and thus William Howitt's spirit-drawings, like their congeners, partake of the character of the diagram—their lines, circles, and angles may truly be designated 'cogitative,' and produced by the clear demonstration of some moral or intellectual truth—their outer form is but a means to an end."

Spirit Identity.

There are among other noteworthy recitals three excellent cases of Spirit Identity,† to one only of which can we make partial reference. The medium was C. Foster, just arrived from America, and the sitting was held at Mr. Howitt's house at Highgate. Colonel Drayson was present, and received what he considered a conclusive proof of Spirit Identity.

"Later on in the evening, Foster said that there was a spirit of a woman, apparently of the poorer class, standing near to my wife, who was anxious to speak about a daughter, regarding whom she was in solicitude. On being asked who this spirit was, he said she replied, 'One who died of cancer.' My wife begged him not to refer to things so painful; but he asked, 'How then was the poor woman's spirit to identify herself?' My younger daughter and a lady present knew immediately who was intended. It was the spirit of a poor woman whom they had discovered in Agar-Town (a miserable district then lying between Highgate and London), and who had begged of them after her death to take the daughter, quite a girl, from her drunken step-father, who otherwise would be the ruin of her, and place her with some respectable woman. They had done this, placing her with a worthy widow who kept a shop; but during the recent absence from England of my daughter and her friend, the drunken step-father had taken her away, and was realising all that her mother's fear foreboded, through the terrible scenes into which this wretched step-father had introduced the girl. These ladies then asked what the spirit wished done for her daughter. She replied through the medium, that she desired her to be taken from her step-father, and placed in a certain institution for young girls. They replied that this institution was one belonging to the Church of England—and that she herself during life had been a Methodist. She replied that she did not mind this; and they promised to do what could be done to get the child placed in this institution (all of which was ultimately done, and the girl grew up a good and useful woman).

"Upon receiving their promise to befriend her child, the spirit of the poor woman expressed her great gratification and withdrew. Now, all this must assuredly have been unknown to Foster, only arrived a day or two from America, and knowing nothing of the circumstances or persons alluded to."

We had marked for notice some other among many narratives that would have interested our readers, but space forbids. For some striking cases of Apparitions at the Time of Death (pp. 171 to 174), of Clairvoyant Dreams (pp. 210 and 234), and of the Symbolic Teachings, which William Howitt received (p. 252), our readers must be referred to the volume, which, we trust, most of them will add to their list of valued books. They will find in it much to instruct, much to charm, and not a line nor a thought to jar or to repel. It has been to the author a labour of love to sketch her father's life as a Spiritualist. The record of that strenuous existence is outlined by the tenderest and most loving touches. The father's robust and downright nature, gains some golden tints from the light shed on it by the poetic imagination, no less than by the deep affection of his daughter. Demonstrated fact, illuminated by a quickened imagination, and irradiated by a loving heart, brings us as near to the realm of spirit as man may reach.

THE POPULAR LIFE OF BUDDHA, containing an answer to the "Hibbert Lectures" of 1881. By Arthur Lillie, Member of the Royal Asiatic Society. With five Illustrations. Kegan Paul, Trench and Co. Can also be obtained from this office. Price 6s.

The author of this book is well known to our readers in connection with "Buddha and Early Buddhism," and in common with his earlier work there is much in that now under notice of interest to Spiritualists and Theosophists at the present time. Mr. Lillie is a practised writer, evidently well versed in his subject, and to our mind writes none the less forcibly of the great historic faith of the East by reason of his knowledge of psychological facts. The main object of the work is to controvert the position of Mr. Rhys Davids, who holds that Buddhism teaches Atheism, annihilation, and the non-existence of soul. How far he has been successful our readers must judge for themselves. Meanwhile we reserve our own comments on two or three passages of special interest to our readers, and which we hope shortly to quote in these columns.

DRAMA OF THE LATTER DAYS. A SUGGESTION.—"A Catholic Priest" in this pamphlet draws a picture of the probable reception of Jesus of Nazareth were He to appear once more on earth—how they at first reject and afterwards accept Him as the Messiah that was to come, his object being to suggest, in this way, a basis of unity amongst the sects.

HINTS ON ESOTERIC THEOSOPHY.—A fresh supply of Parts Nos. I. and II. have been received by the Psychological Press Association. Particulars will be found in our advertisement pages.

CASSELL'S ALMANACK for 1884, besides the usual information found in calendars, also contains a complete story by G. Manville Fenn, short biographical sketches of "Notable Men of the Year," and a variety of full-page and other illustrations. The excellence of Cassell and Co.'s publications is too well-known to need further endorsement, and this almanack is fully up to the average.

The sine-qua-non for Mediumship Automatic Insulator.

Applies to the appearance of my advertisement announcing the above clairvoyantly suggested little psychical accessory, kindly oblige me with space to state that in addition to the obviously great improvement and advantages they possess in their construction (over the old-fashioned Planchette Indicator) commented upon in "LIGHT," No. 93, I have now perfected them by fitting "Crystal Balls" to the Patent Registered Exhibition Prize Medal Castors already adapted to them, by which not only is the completest Magnetoid Insulation secured, but the Balls themselves used apart from the Insulator afford a ready means for developing the Trance and Seeing phases, of course, to individually inclined capacity, so securing in one instrument a most practically useful combination. New descriptive circulars just published supplied on receipt of stamp for postage. Reserving all rights of production and sale.—I remain yours truly, ROBERT H. FRYAR, Bath.—[Adv.]

SPIRITUALISM AND OUR ORTHODOX LEADERS.

By F. J. THEOBALD.

II.

Twenty-three years ago, the Rev. Dr. Mullens published the "Memorials of the Rev. A. F. Lacroix," who was his father-in-law, and, like himself, a most energetic missionary in India.

Both these good men belonged to the "London Missionary Society."

M. Lacroix was born at the village of Lignièrès, in Switzerland, on the 10th of May, 1799.

His father passed away, only a few days after the birth of his son. But an uncle supplied this loss so fully that the lad never felt the want of a loving father's care. He had a large school for boys, and educated his nephew himself.

At the early age of fifteen, Mr. Mullens tells, us how the current of his father-in-law's life was distinctly turned, by a beautiful spiritual intervention, given in distinct answer to prayer. Young Lacroix had set his heart upon joining Napoleon's army, in spite of the earnest entreaties of both his mother and uncle. He left home, with the full determination of going direct to the headquarters of the Swiss recruit depot at Berne.

So distressed was his good uncle at thus parting with his beloved boy, that, as Mr. Mullens says, "he carried his griefs and disappointments to a throne of grace, entreating that, where earthly affections and ties seemed powerless, the authority of Heaven might interfere." In distinct reply to this prayer, we read that as young Lacroix was within sight of the end of his journey "suddenly a hand seemed laid upon his shoulder, and a voice rang loud in his heart: 'What dost thou here?' He paused, obeyed, and at once hastened back; his purpose vanished for ever! and flinging himself into his uncle's arms, he exclaimed, 'Ah! dear uncle! you have been praying for me! you have been calling me back! and here I am!' He now settled quietly to his studies, and gave his kind guardian the highest satisfaction and delight.

The following year we find M. Lacroix studying the works of Jung Stilling, the German philosopher and mystic. His little book called "Scenes in the Kingdom of Spirit" had so great a spiritual influence upon the youth, that, whilst he had always been a high principled, good young fellow, he now "rose to a higher level of religious principle," "became a decided Christian," and "gave himself to Christ, as his Saviour and his Master, resolving in all his future life to be ruled by His Divine will." M. Lacroix's interest in Stilling's works was life-long.

Therefore, we were not disappointed in our expectations, but, on reading further into the volume, found that this good Christian man was to all intents and purposes a true Spiritualist. He taught his children from their earliest years "to believe that temporal things are strangely linked with those that are spiritually discerned."

The chapter headed "Home Life" is contributed by Mrs. Mullens, who was M. Lacroix's eldest daughter. With reference to her father's spiritual teachings she says they "prepared them in after-life to receive his speculations on the world to come (ever in accordance with Holy Writ) almost in the light of a revelation. Not but that he himself always checked such a feeling, saying 'Those are my ideas merely; and although I believe I have the Spirit of God, yet I may be mistaken.' It was this diffidence that prevented him speaking of these things except to his most intimate friends; and yet, in sketching his life, to omit a mention of his speculations, his beliefs, and his researches into the mystical, would be to separate him from that atmosphere which went with him where he went, rested with him where he rested, and hovered over every thought and action of his life.

"He hardly looked upon Heaven as wholly beyond this life; but in some part, essentially in it, as the root of the flower is within the mould." . . . "Truly it was a precious faith, for

Into one perfect peace."

"But," Mrs. Mullens continues, "he went beyond this. He was a firm believer in apparitions," carefully collecting all accounts of such phenomena, and "the result was that after rejecting huge masses of what was purely the growth of superstition, credulity, or jugglery, there were still thousands of well accredited facts to prove that the dead have appeared, and do still at times continue to appear, to the living. The belief was found everywhere. Scripture sustained the doctrine. History was full of it. Nearly every family had a story founded on it. Every district had a haunted place, or house. And so my father accepted it."

One very remarkable incident Mrs. Mullens relates (see p. 346), the truth of which she declares her father "believed as firmly as if he had had the evidence of his own senses in its favour, because it occurred to a dear and valued friend of his, a missionary in South India. This friend succeeded another missionary, who had died, leaving the accounts of the mission in a state of hopeless complication. And yet as he was an honest, upright man it was not to be supposed that he had embezzled the money for private purposes. The only question was, what had become of the missing £70! or if they had not been expended where were they to be found?

"After spending several days in trying to solve the mystery, my father's friend threw himself on the sofa wearied both in mind and body; sorely tempted to say very hard things of his predecessor for having given him such unnecessary trouble."

"This was in broad daylight, about three o'clock in the afternoon. After lying awhile, he distinctly saw the figure of a man, dressed in clerical habiliments, rise, as it were, out of the ground, and proceed to the table, where were lying a mass of papers and accounts, relative to the affairs of the mission. Selecting one, the spectre placed it uppermost, looked round at his astonished successor, and immediately disappeared.

"On the open page was a memorandum, stating that £70 of the mission money had been lent to a certain gentleman at Madras, at a high interest. This gentleman was applied to, acknowledged the debt, and refunded the amount." While speaking of the usefulness of such spirit communications, even if for apparently trivial purposes, Mrs. Mullens says that her father agreed with Southey, regarding such matters, viz.: "That the end is sufficient, if sometimes one of those unhappy persons, who looking through the dim glass of infidelity, see nothing beyond this life and the narrow sphere of mortal existence, should, from the well-established truth of one such story, be led to a conclusion that there are 'more things in Heaven and earth than are dreamed of in his philosophy.' . . . Surely every friend of religion may bid God-speed to the inquirer, who pushes his researches into regions whence he never fails to bring us tidings of the soul's immortality, and the reality of a future life."

"My Visit to Styria," by Miss Caroline Corner, having proved a success, it is that lady's intention to publish another volume of her late "Visit to Rhineland," the proceeds of which (expenses cleared) are to go towards giving a number of the poorest little children of the East End of London a treat at Christmas, by way of a good tea, amusements, and a Christmas tree, from which prizes of useful articles of warm clothing may be drawn. Miss Caroline Corner earnestly requests the kind co-operation of friends and other sympathetic and benevolent persons, by means of subscriptions for the book, "Rhineland," (published at 1s. 6d. and 2s. 6d. per copy), or by donations of clothes for the little ones, or both.—Address, Miss Caroline Corner, 3, St. Thomas's-square, Hackney, London, N.E.

INTERESTING MANIFESTATIONS.

Spirit Lights.

I wish to publish a report of a very interesting manifestation from which I have derived intense happiness. All advanced Spiritualists have heard of the appearance of lights in darkness—many have seen them—I have done so often—in the presence of Daniel Home frequently, and also when the medium was Mrs. Fox Jencken. During a sitting I have seen perhaps as many as twenty flitting about at one time. I did so within the week past, at one of my ordinary sittings; eight persons being present.

But to see lights when no medium is present, has been,—if I am rightly informed—the privilege of few.

It has become mine, but only recently, although I have been a Spiritualist, deriving enjoyment, instruction, and Christian teaching, from that prolific source of them all, for nearly, or quite thirty years.

It may delight some and astound others, if I say in one sentence—I see my beloved wife every night when I lie down on my bed. I will describe the circumstances as clearly as I can, but I cannot do so very clearly.

My bedroom is thoroughly dark: made so by thick curtains across the windows: every ray of light from gas-lamps or moon-light is excluded: I carefully cover a brass bedstead, and put out of the way a luminous match-box. In short, I use the precautions I am bound to use to prevent the possibility of delusion: deception is, of course, out of the question, as I am alone.

A few minutes after I lie down, when I have said prayers and repeated the evening hymn of Bishop Ken, and a hymn of my own—

"How can I for a moment doubt
The loving mercy of my God?"

the space between the foot of my bed and the wall becomes slightly illuminated (previously, it was utterly dark), dark clouds pass across it. Soon they seem chased away, and light clouds take their place (obviously, unless there was light as a background, dark clouds could not be distinguished): a number of such light clouds seem to be flitting about: gradually they combine and assume form—the "human form": the upper part of which is light, the lower, white drapery.

The figure remains before me for generally two minutes: it then moves nearer to me, and I see it above my head.

Several times I have received "pattings" on the forehead: they are promised kisses on my brow.

Usually sparks of light issue from the light clouds: the dark clouds become fringed with light and gradually disappear.

The vision—if so I am to call it—generally lasts about five minutes; when the room becomes again thoroughly dark. This vision—so to call it—has appeared to me just forty times, continuously every night—excepting two nights; on these two nights I had been greatly fatigued during the days, and it is well known to Spiritualists that when exhaustion of the atmosphere of "living" women and men would abstract too much of the element of life, spirits, who love those with whom they are in communion, do nothing; no manifestation takes place. I have sat with Daniel Home several times when power was entirely withheld from him. In his present state of weak health, he has ceased to have power, except on rare occasions or by fits and starts. I have had but two messages from my wife through him during nearly three years.

Your readers will ask how I know the form to be that of my wife? I will tell them.

I have received through the mediumship of Mrs. Jencken several "messages" from my wife: making pointed reference to this light—to these lights. I will copy passages from them.

"Doubt not my presence when you have the proof in the most beautiful of all signs—the light that always accompanies happy spirits. Only few behold that light as you do."

"This is another delight added to my crown of happiness to be able to give you a sign of my presence in light: thus I feel a new happiness, such as one feels after a long separation when clasping a beloved one in fond embrace."

"In the light you see, I come. It is my soul looking through my eyes upon my all on earth. We ought to be very happy, and very grateful for our blessings."

"The lights are mine, I come with a light, a visible proof of my presence: they will grow brighter as I grow stronger in power. I shall soon be able to come and place the light on you, and answer you by the lights."

"The lights will very soon be brighter and stronger."

"Every night I come to you in two ways: first I come and breathe a blessing upon you, then I bring my light, and remain with you all the time you are awake."

"Do not fear the clouds; do not let them annoy you. They are only shadows undeveloped: my light dispels all gloom."

These messages were given at several times, but always when Mrs. Jencken was by my side: two of them were, however, direct messages; that is to say, not written by Mrs. Jencken, but by my wife, in her own handwriting.

By a large proportion of your readers all I desire to be understood will be understood. It is simply this—that those who are called "the dead" can and do communicate with those who are called "the living."

I might furnish other evidence of that solemn, comforting, encouraging, and "happiness-giving" fact: the delights arising from which cannot be exaggerated.

"Hast thou been told that from the viewless bourne,
The dark way never hath allowed return?
That all which tears can move, with life is fled,
That earthly love is powerless on the dead?
Believe it not!"

But I dare not go at any length into this branch of my subject. If I did I should necessarily occupy too much of your limited space. Yet I will ask you to print the following most beautifully eloquent "message" I received from my beloved wife, at mid-day in full sunshine, on Sunday, the 4th of September, by direct writing, no one being present but Mrs. Jencken and myself. I was told in her (Mrs. J's.) handwriting, "place some paper under the table." I did so, and immediately heard the paper rattle, so to speak. Then came a message, "Take up the paper." I did so. Barely half a minute had passed between my putting the paper down and taking it up. This message was written on both sides of a large slip of paper. It is no disparagement to the intellect of Mrs. Jencken to say she could no more have written language so eloquently beautiful, than she could have written "Paradise Lost."

"When you come to our home so bright, you will rejoice; but you cannot come yet: be patient. I have left all sorrow, for earth is full of sadness. No weary wasting of life here, no shrinking from the bitter winds, no threat of coming evil, no grief, no cheerless homes, no despair, no vain prayer for speedy relief from suffering, no broken hearts are here, no severed friends over mournful memories to weep, for all are re-united, no bed of death for loving eyes to watch the pulseless sleep, no parting here, no death, no blasted hopes, no faded flowers, no destruction, no fierce battle startled with fear and dread the peace of Heaven, but the loving choir sings through the celestial sphere,—'Look up, thou weary stricken one, thy wounded heart shall grieve no more at earth's decay and death's shadow, while you have faith in the Great Master.—Your own MARY.'"

I am promised manifestations even greater and more emphatic than that I have described in this paper. The promise is to "talk" with me when I am "alone;" without the intervention of a medium. I shall rejoice when it is so: although I have entire confidence, as well as great interest in, and much affection for, the Medium who has been so frequent, so effective, and so sure a means of bringing into actual communication—into direct personal intercourse—my beloved wife who is in Heaven, and myself.

I believe a time is coming to very many of us when mediumship will not be required. Why it is now I can no more guess than I can as to many other marvels, of which God, Who "works in a mysterious way, His wonders to perform," postpones the revelation of the why and the how.

"Ask of ten thousand things the reason why,
And take the only answer—It is so!"

Probably this is not the only communication you will receive from me on this deeply interesting subject. For the present, it must suffice to say I no more doubt that in these lights I recognise the actual personal presence of my beloved wife than I doubt that I am now writing with pen and ink on white paper. I am as capable of exercising sound judgment as to the one as I am as to the other, and have equally reliable evidence as to either and both. In a single sentence I conclude this paper:—I know my wife can and does appear to me continually—graciously and mercifully permitted to do so by her and my Divine Master—to console, to comfort, guide, and encourage me, so long as I remain on earth, until, released from its bonds, I rejoin her, to be led by her and with her many other dear friends, to the footstool of the Lord and Master, Christ.

SPIRIT TEACHINGS.

SECOND SERIES.

This series of Spirit-Teachings, like the former, is made up of selections from a great mass which have been automatically written during a series of years. They are selected on no other principle than that of printing what has been valuable to the person for whom they were originally given, in so far as this can be done without trenching on what is merely of personal and private application. The latter consideration excludes a great mass of what would otherwise be interesting and valuable matter. The phraseology has been preserved, as far as possible, intact, names only being omitted. The series follows directly on the first, from which, indeed, it is separated only by the accident of its publication in another journal, and after some considerable interval of time. The publication is resumed in deference to many repeated requests.

No. XLIII.

We are passing through a phase of spiritual distress which reacts on me greatly: principally, as I believe, in consequence of susceptibility to spiritual impressions for the development of which you are responsible. Yet at such seasons you withdraw, and do not attempt by any means to alleviate my trouble, or to throw light on the difficulties that beset the cause. You have such power surely, or you are not equipped with the first requisites for your mission. We want guidance and protection. Instead of giving them you withdraw. Seasons when the powers antagonistic to you seem to have paramount sway are calculated to cause searching of heart in us. These are times when we question whether it be well to open the spiritual floodgates, and let in all and sundry who wait beyond. The outcome of the movement seems to us questionable; and that quite independently of the personal aspect of it. We want comfort, and you withdraw; hope, and you are silent.

Then I want to know in definite language, how and why this crisis has come. Who is responsible? What is it to do? Am I correct in my belief that Spiritualism will make no head in my day? Or is that a desponding view not justified by your wider knowledge? On this point it is that I direct you to the words of Judge Edmonds, through Mrs. Tappan to which I before referred.

What you allege is in many respects untrue, and your conclusions partake of the falsity of the groundwork on which they stand. You complain that we desert you in a time of difficulty. Nothing could be more directly the reverse. We rather guard you with tenfold care, and use precautions for your protection which are not the less real because you are not able to estimate them. It is your misfortune that you refer our operations exclusively to that which is objective to your corporeal senses. You make no count of that which is spiritual and impalpable to bodily sense. Yet there it is that our operations are real and potent. The little that is projected on the material plane is but the shadow of the real spiritual work which is going on ceaselessly in the domain of spirit. It is there that our operations centre. Of this, in your present state of spiritual disturbance you take no count.

We do, indeed, so far as we can, withdraw at such times objective manifestations of our power, because such are fraught with risk. It is not when the enemy surrounds the fort that we desire to throw open the gates and invite them to come in. We have frequently told you that care is required in throwing open the portals to the spirit-world. You know that it is so. The risk of incursion of undeveloped spirits is real and pressing, and that is not all the risk. It is very necessary for us to be careful for your own sake. The faith that you place in us and in our dealings would sustain a rude shock were the messages to become foolish, frivolous, or untruthful. The slender basis on which it rests would be overthrown, and we should see our work ruined and undone. Yet we run grave risk of that if we attempt to convey messages to you when your spirit is not at rest, and when the spiritual atmosphere is thick and heavy with the miasma which now surrounds you.

You would blame us on all sides; if we do not speak, if we speak wrongly, or not sufficiently, or overmuch or over little. We cannot ensure truth and reason under circumstances which invoke folly and deceit. We prefer to avoid the risk by remaining outwardly silent, the while we labour to throw around you spiritual conditions of harmony and peace. Ignorant as you are of the world of cause, you must be content to allow us who labour in it to act as we see best. The world of spirit is the world of cause, and what you now deplore is but a faint shadow of the strife that rages in it. You ask us of the reason for this strife in your world. We have already told you in brief that it is from the world of spirit that the cause is derived. We are passing through an epoch in which great efforts are being made by the Adversaries. The powers antagonistic to us vex and harm us and you; and the wave of spiritual disturbance generated here extends to the spiritual atmosphere that surrounds you.

The words to which you have referred us have a distinct illustrative bearing on this point. You will see, if you meditate on them, that it is so. You are the recipients of spirit influence, and whatever the nature of that influence may be, it comes to you as it left us. Just as we have always told you that great and noble ideas have their inception in the world of spirit, so is it with the disturbing influences which work among you evil and unrest. They are all spiritual. What our friend, the Judge, says about the influence of spirit-deliberation upon your earth is precisely true, but should not be new to you. One effect of this spiritual disturbance on you is to obliterate for the time being much that you will remember again when the flood is past. If you will look back you will see that, and if you are wise and will be guided by those who can see causes, whereas you only trace effects, you will make retrospect your business now. Be content to make sure of the ground over which you have passed, and do not seek to climb higher now when the fog is round you. The ascent has been made with pains and care, and no point gained has been lost. You have mounted higher and higher, and now that the mists have settled down around you, be content to wait awhile and rest. When the clouds lift and the sun shines out again you will be surprised at the prospect which opens out to you, a prospect which will be all the more bright and glorious for the gloom which has preceded it. Now is not the time to climb higher, nor is it the time to explore around your standpoint. You may fall and be dashed to pieces, and in your fall may carry many with you to destruction. Be content to rest. We tell you that the time of trouble will pass. It may be necessary that the storm winds blow the mist aside, and that a time of turbulence and distress come. It may be. We do not say it will be. But even if it be, shelter yourself behind the rock to which you have climbed. There are those near who will aid and save you. They will not indeed wrap you round in softness, and deprive you of the benefit of a deep spiritual experience necessary for your development. That they may not do, but they will warn, guide, and protect you from ill, and when the storm has burst, or the fog has lifted, you shall go on your way in confidence and peace, having the quietness of assurance, and the joy that cometh in the morning when the sorrows of night are past. Rest assured that you are not now the best judge of the future. Leave it alone, and look to the past. We may with reason ask you to repose confidence in us. We are acting in your own best interests in withholding as far as possible all external manifestations. You do not know the risk you run. We know and use our discretion. No risk shall arise from our rashness, and no false or foolish communication shall shock your faith, so far as we can help it. It has been a great difficulty to write this. Ask what is in your mind briefly.

There is a great deal in what you say. You would have us avoid sitting then?

Not altogether: but sit under direction only. It is not in our power, nor is it in our will to produce objective manifestations now. If it were in accordance with your minds, we would advise little or no meeting in circle.

But we do not like to cease altogether.

Do not cease altogether. We counsel only reticence and moderation. You should know by this time when it is well to sit. Use your own judgment.

Precisely. You tell me I have none, and then urge me to sit.

You have none in the sense of foresight and foreknowledge which belongs to spirit. Such as you have you must use, so that it may be strengthened, and so that you may learn by experience. You will so gain your spiritual training. It is part of your education. You will be guided: but we may not act for you.

I took some steps about publishing my essay on the Religious Aspect of Spiritualism, but it does not seem to come to anything.*

Wait, the time is not yet.

Something of the kind is required.

Not now. Do not climb further. Be content to wait in peace. We will not say more, for we have said more now than is quite wise. We leave you with the blessing of the Supreme, and with the assurance that we do not neglect any of our friends, though we may seem to be silent.

+ IMPERATOR.

A NEWLY formed Spiritual organisation, having its headquarters in London, requires three or four rooms near Charing Cross. Can any of our readers inform us of suitable premises?

* This, of course, was written before the publication of my book, "Higher Aspects of Spiritualism."

CORRESPONDENCE.

[It is preferable that correspondents should append their names and addresses to communications. In any case, how ever, these must be supplied to the Editor as a guarantee of good faith.]

The Kiddle Mystery.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—If there is a man whom I like to call friend, and whom I have so regarded for years, it is "M.A. (Oxon.)" But still I must say what is to be said as though our friendship did not exist. In his "Notes" in your issue of 8th September, he permits himself certain expressions about the Mahatma, Koot Hoomi, sneers and innuendoes more natural to a Saturday writer, than to so practised a medium and Spiritualist as he. Surely my friend forgets himself and the record of the Spiritualistic movement, when he finds in the appearance of a few unquoted and unimportant sentences from Mr. Kiddle, in the Occult World, any warrant for such jealous nagging. Has he lost sight of the several instances of similar re-appropriation of ideas without credit in mediumistic literature, where the bona fides of the scribe were undoubted? Am I wrong in the recollection that the printing of Mr. Duguid's "Hafed, Prince of Persia," an "inspirational" work written under test conditions, as alleged, had to be stopped, because a very extended plagiarism was discovered, and the publishers of the work affected sued for infringement of copyright? And that none were so surprised at the plagiarism as the witnesses to Mr. Duguid's literary labour? How many such examples of this duple—even coincident writing—might be discovered in literature perhaps the encyclopedic bookworms of London may tell us. Outsiders ignorant of the very rudiments of spiritual phenomena and philosophy may be excused for seeking in craft and dishonesty the sole explanation of such facts; but we whose studies are of things noumenal have so many unexplained mysteries, that it seems in wretched taste to adopt the tone of the cheap jacks of the weekly Press, when a question of this sort is to be discussed. If "M.A. (Oxon.)" thinks it so very funny that a very small patch from Mr. Kiddle's robe should have been stitched into the garment of Koot Hoomi's thought, I can, since he believes my word, give him a much tougher nut to crack. In the last number of the Nineteenth Century, in the very thoughtful article "After Death," occurs a passage of about a dozen lines which is word for word identical with what was written by this same Koot Hoomi, two years ago, in a private letter to myself. Yet no third party has seen the letter, nor have I copied or printed the passage in question. Again, when the report of one of Mrs. Hardinge Britten's American Lectures appeared in—if I mistake not—the Spiritual Scientist, Madame Blavatsky found in it a passage verbatim from the as yet unpublished "Isis Unveiled," which Mrs. Britten had not seen. And the M.S. was actually altered so as to avoid the appearance of plagiarism. I do not undertake to explain the Kiddle mystery at all, nor do I think it of much consequence. It is highly absurd to think that a mind capable of reducing to expression in a foreign tongue so lofty a scheme of evolution as that in "Esoteric Buddhism," would be driven to fish for ideas in Mr. Kiddle's speeches, or the pages of any Spiritualistic journal. When my friend of London has explained away the mystery of his own mediumship, it will be in order for him to throw stones into his neighbour's garden. The Eastern philosophy teaches us that nature carries her economical system even into the sphere of ideas; and that not only is no atom of matter lost, but also not even a thought. As the ether is the matrix of visible nature and its phenomena, so, the Asiatic says, ideas survive in the akash (their word for our Western ether), and are carried from mind to mind throughout the ages. You will find in our folk-lore even common proverbs which embody this thought; and most assuredly it betokens unripeness of experience in psychology to raise the hue and cry at any seeming "plagiarism." "M.A. (Oxon.)" is a clergyman: suppose he sneers for a while at the identity of 2 Kings xx. and Isaiah xxxviii. in language and ideas. Was this also a case of plagiarism or of duplex inspiration? However, let all this pass as fit only for children, and scientists of a certain type who grin at their "soul" through the horse-collar of matter. The suggestion that Mr. Rhys-Davids, or any one else at the West, knows more about Buddhism than the most learned living Buddhist philosophers is to the last degree absurd, but still only one more manifestation of the vanity which has made a conspiracy of our savants to put down the Asiatic pandit and Vihku as persons of no account, so to say. When one sees Professor Weber fancying he can crush out Indian antiquity by sitting upon its literary remains, like the pitying she-elephant upon the deserted brood of young partridges, and the Sanscrit chairs of Indian colleges filled, not by Native but by European professors, who have it not in their blood to comprehend the Esotericism of India—what wonder that Buddhists should be called within the enchanted circle of Bow-Bells, to hear the truth about their ancestral philosophy! Even I, your humble correspondent who am a thousand leagues away from being an adept, claim to know something about Buddhism, in spirit and letter, as the high priest Hikkaduwa Samangala's certificate to my "Buddhist Catechism" also proves. I am just to-day starting on a journey to Upper India and Kashmir, where I shall see Koot Hoomi, and one or more of his Tibetan chelas (pupils:—and, by the way, many of the Koot Hoomi letters are written by them as his secretaries, hemerely giving the general ideas, and they elaborating them, and even "precipitating" them in his proper handwriting. The example of the precipitation of the Fakir, by Madame Blavatsky, at New York, will illustrate this scientifico-psychic phenomenon). I shall be tempted to ask him to have a glance at what "M.A. (Oxon.)" thinks so very amusing a "skit" at him.—I am, Sir, &c.,

H. S. OLCOTT,
President, Theosophical Society.

Adyar, 27th September, 1883.

The Theosophical Society and its Critics.
To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Although I am not authorised to speak in the name of the above Society, and might on some points not now be recognised as a true representative, yet, as one of the original members, perhaps I may be allowed to say something on certain matters in connection with it which have been recently commented upon in your paper.

Your correspondent "S." in "LIGHT," of this week states that Mr. Hurrey Chintamon "could not agree with some of the doctrines or rules put forward by Colonel Olcott, either from his own intuition or under the inspiration of his guiding star; consequently, he declined to have anything more to do with the founders, and the Colonel, therefore, after the manner of his countrymen, took the matter into his own hands, and 'bossed the job' himself."

Your correspondent is evidently uninformed, or misinformed as to the true circumstances under which Mr. Chintamon ceased to be a member of the Theosophical Society. As I do not choose to make myself responsible for, or even to repeat, charges which I cannot personally verify, I will only say that some four years ago the London branch of the Society received an intimation from the Indian headquarters of Mr. Chintamon's formal expulsion. Colonel Olcott did not assume the Presidency (which I suppose is what "S." means by "bossing the job") upon Mr. Chintamon's retirement, but held that office from the very first. Nor had the settlement of the headquarters in India any connection with the Chintamon affair, which did not come to light till after Colonel Olcott's and Madame Blavatsky's arrival at Bombay early in 1879.

So much for the above specimen of the force and accuracy of attacks upon the Theosophical Society.

The second subject I have to refer to is one of more difficulty, and I cannot echo the light-hearted contempt with which certain advanced Theosophists, perhaps even the Society in general, are able to regard it. I mean what is known as "the Kiddle incident." My embarrassment does not arise from any, the smallest, difficulty in realising the occult explanation often suggested among ourselves in the Society, and adverted to by Mr. W. T. Brown in his letter in your paper. The conclusive results in "Thought-Transference" obtained by the Psychical Research Society should make it at least intelligible even to those not already long familiar with the idea. In my own mind this conception not only stands as a most certain truth, but I believe it to be a far more important and practical one than is generally supposed. A year ago I insisted at great length in your columns on the objectivity of thought, on the fact that mental energy in this resembles manual energy, and that whatever is thus wrought out becomes henceforth independent of the individual consciousness, is part of the intellectual stock of mankind, whether expressed in words or not, and finds entrance into similarly occupied minds, as their "happy thoughts," and "sudden inspirations." Let no real thinker despair, or fear his work is lost, because it cannot find a "publisher," unless indeed he cares only for nominal fame and recognition. It will assuredly find a public. As he sits at his desk, and before the words which embody his conception can be transferred to paper, that conception has passed into the universal medium of what, relatively to us now, and only so relatively, is the spiritual world. It is this medium which constitutes the sphere of the anima mundi. If we are compelled to speak of its operations and rapports with individual minds in quasi-materialistic language, as "astral currents" and so forth, that is only because the objective, the transferable, of every state or condition is the "matter" of that condition, absolute spirit being thus the negation of all objectivity. And what is true of mere thought is of course not less true of that further and more external objectivity which it gains by verbal expression. This outward form, even, will be conserved with fidelity, and transmitted with despatch along the psychical lines of attraction and least resistance. But such outward form will only be perceived (as a rule) by those intuitively capable of reading off the message in what we call the Astral Light. It does not follow even with them—and in relation to this "Kiddle incident" let that be borne in mind—that the nominal authorship will be known. All that comes is just so much as is relevant to the matter on hand, for it is just the mental occupation which attracts it. The astral post, be it remembered, is not bound to carry a whole newspaper.

Now on the above supposition—to me no "supposition" at all, but a fact of daily and universal, though seldom recognised experience—the circumstance that the passage from Mr. Kiddle's lecture was somewhat altered and adapted to suit the Adepts teachings, is of no significance whatever. Of course that is how the passage so consciously seen and read would be dealt with for the purpose in hand. A medium, no doubt, would have given the whole in its integrity as a spirit-teaching. The adept, on the other hand, says:—"Here is an excellent general expression of the idea I have got to give, just come before me, from what quarter I know not and care not, but it contains this, that, and the other, which won't do, and must be altered accordingly."

If, therefore, we had no facts to go upon but the mere coincidence itself, that would have no more disturbed me than it disturbs some whose acquaintance with the above ideas is, perhaps, rather more recent than my own. But there are two other facts which I cannot but relate to one another in connection with this coincidence. One is that the letter of "Koot Hoomi" in question, like most of the rest in the "Occult World," was transmitted to Mr. Sinnett by Madame Blavatsky. The other is that Madame Blavatsky sees the Banner of Light, in which Mr. Kiddle's lecture was published, as regularly as any Boston Spiritualist. This would naturally be the case with the editor of a paper like the Theosophist, and appears from frequent citations therein. But even here I must interpose another cautionary remark, which is that that very fact would make the psychic transmission to a mind in intimate rapport with Madame Blavatsky's—as Koot Hoomi's may be assumed to be—all the more likely. Her mind would thus be the real point of departure. Nevertheless, were it an open question, free from authoritative statement, so that such a suggestion could be made without offence by one who would if possible avoid offence, I should avow the opinion that these letters, whether they are or are not the ipsissima verba of any adept, were at all events penned by Madame Blavatsky, or by other accepted chelas. At least, I should think that she was a medium for their production, and not merely for their transmission. The fact that through the kindness of Mr. Sinnett I have been made familiar with the handwriting of the letters, and that it bears not the remotest resemblance to Madame Blavatsky's, would not influence me against that opinion, for reasons which every one acquainted with the phenomena of writing under psychical conditions will appreciate. But I am bound to admit that there are circumstances connected with the receipt by Mr. Sinnett of other letters signed, "K. H." which are, as regards those, apparently inconsistent with any instrumentality of Madame Blavatsky herself, whether as medium or otherwise, and the handwriting is in both cases the same.

That even on the above supposition, these teachings are still the faithful transcript of a very high tradition, I have little doubt. I am fortified in this belief from a peculiarly well-informed and now quite independent source. But the significance of the Kiddle coincidence will not be lightly ignored by any uncommitted person. One may be an "occultist," and may yet agree with the shrewd, if superficial, Mrs. Poyser, as to the necessity for abstruse explanations of the cat being found in the dairy. As an illustration, I may say that I entirely agreed in principle with the able and instructive letter which Mr. A. R. Wallace addressed to "LIGHT" on the occasion of the alleged "exposure" of a medium some fourteen months ago. And yet I have seen too many "materialisations" to allow myself thus to account for all, or even most of the "exposures." I am very far indeed from suggesting that the evidence in this case is anything like so incalculable as that which makes wilful deception the only rational verdict in the case of many so-called "spiritual" phenomena. But I do say that in proportion as known facts make one explanation easy and natural, they make a more remote one difficult and far-fetched. I think that if in this particular matter anyone is to fall back on personal confidence in Madame Blavatsky, as the ground of rejecting the apparent explanation, that position should be distinctly and publicly taken. It would be intelligible to all, and doubtless sufficient for very many. But I do not wish it to be supposed that the Society, here at least, is quite unanimous in regarding the matter as unworthy of public notice, or as not calling for some further information. We owe this to the general public, whose attention we have claimed by our recent attitude. And it is due to ourselves if we are to repel attacks with confidence and success. I believe I may say that Mr. Sinnett, though himself attaching no importance whatever to the incident, has made a concession to weak brethren like myself by seeking for an explanation, which, if yielded, may at least commit somebody to something.

Parallel Passages.

SIR,—In your issue of September 29th, you were good enough to insert my letter on the parallel passages noted by Mr. Kiddle in Koot Hoomi's letter as given by Mr. Sinnett, and in an address delivered by himself at Lake Pleasant in August, 1880. I have been rather disappointed that Mr. Sinnett has not followed up his remarks in your paper of September 22nd, by some further elucidation of the matter. His words, "for the moment all I can say is," seem to warrant your readers in expecting a further reply. Will you allow me a short space to refer to the letter of his apologist, Mr. W. T. Brown, which appears in your issue of to-day.

On looking again at the parallel passages as they stand in "LIGHT" of September 1st, I find, near the commencement, a sequence of nineteen words exactly alike in the two passages. Further on, there is another sequence of nineteen words exactly alike. Again, towards the end, there is a sequence of thirty words in Mr. Kiddle's address which is exactly reproduced in Koot Hoomi's letter, except for the insertion of one word in the latter,—"uninitiated" before "mortals." Besides these, there are several other clauses almost identical.

These are the facts before us. I submit that the attitude of mind assumed by Mr. Brown, which I cannot help characterising as somewhat supercilious and patronising, is entirely out of place, and beside the mark. There is no occasion for Mr. Brown to inform us that "Mr. Kiddle's letter is written conscientiously and in a good spirit." Although, if this is Mr. Brown's opinion, I fail to see why he should say that it is "unpleasant to write letters of such a nature as this to unsympathetic and sceptical men." Finally, Mr. Brown takes credit for his "explanation" being "good-natured," and says, "the absence of knowledge on the part of Mr. Kiddle is assuredly his loss—not ours."

Looking again at the facts, and re-perusing Mr. Brown's letter, I venture to express the opinion that neither common-sense nor spiritual perception would be shown by accepting his remarks as a valid and satisfactory explanation. Knowing, or rather conceiving, the possibilities which may exist, I do not think we are justified at present in using hard words. If Mr. Sinnett has evidence that the identical letter in which the passage occurs, came to him, or was produced in an abnormal manner, a most interesting inquiry opens before us. If, on the other hand, he has no evidence as to this letter, however much he may have as regards others, we shall be bound to come to the prima facie conclusion that someone has imposed upon him, and has consciously adapted the passage from Mr. Kiddle's previously-given address, and passed it off as coming from Koot Hoomi.

Hoping further light may yet be thrown upon the matter,
I am, yours faithfully,

A STUDENT.

Miss Wood at Cape Town, South Africa.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—In August, 1882, Mr. Samuel Defries, of Sydney, Australia, on his way home by the "Orient" line, which has steamers touching here bi-monthly, called on me, having brought a letter of introduction from my friend—one of the greatest living sensitives—William Eglinton. The steamer only stopped a few hours to coal and provision, but during that short time we exchanged ideas on many important matters regarding the welfare of the Truth of Spirit Intercourse. Finding he had made definite arrangements with Miss C. E. Wood—with whom I had grand materialisations, under what I believe to be absolute test conditions, at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, in 1877—to go out to Sydney for the purpose of giving experimental scientific séances to the members of the Liberal Association of Sydney, I prevailed on him to allow her to break the voyage at Cape Town. This can always be done without extra cost, providing passengers get the sanction of the London agents, and run the risk of getting a vacant cabin. The cost from Cape Town to Australia is very nearly as much as from London, so that should, at any future time, any normal worker or medium think of coming to Cape Town on their way to Australia, they must not take our Cape mail boats, but the "Orient" steamers, and be sure to get their tickets endorsed by the purser or agents to break at Cape Town. As we have got a Mesmeric and Psychological Society (about fifty members, Mr. A. Teague, hon. sec.) and a good-sized room for meetings, séances, &c., &c., public workers and professional mediums will find it to their advantage to break the voyage, should they be going out to Australia, as they will not only make it pleasant for themselves, but, if useful, do much good for the cause.

Just one year after Mr. Defries first saw me I got a letter from him, dated England, stating that, if possible, Miss Wood and himself would soon leave for Australia. He could not get passage by the same steamer, so arranged for her to go on before him and remain at Cape Town as my guest for two weeks, when he would take her on.

Knowing Miss Wood would only be with us about twelve days, I made arrangements with a few inquiring minds to attend a few sances. She arrived per "Lusitania" on 3rd and left per "John Elder," on the 15th inst., with her guardian and my friend and brother-worker, Samuel Defries.

I had four sittings at my own house, and two at the rooms of the Psychological Society, under what I consider test conditions, and, considering the hurried preparations, strange sitters (I was the only one who knew Miss Wood,) and rainy weather, the results were extremely satisfactory. Most of the persons at my private sittings, although honest inquirers, were not conversant with the subtle conditions for spirit intercourse, especially materialisation, so I simply risked their forming erroneous impressions.

Miss Wood was literally sewn up in my dressing-gown, and tied down to a heavy arm chair and nailed to the ground, as in these experiments she was sitting behind a curtain out of the view of sitters. We had tolerably good materialisations, and direct writing by "Pocha;" my guitar was manipulated intelligently, and many other simple manifestations. The time being so short we could not sit for personal tests, which I consider are the only ones to bring conviction to novices and those who are simply seekers after signs and wonders. I explained to the sitters that what they saw was only a faint idea of what did take place, and that they should sit for three or four months with her in order to see varied and convincing phenomena.

What did take place was done by human intelligence, which claimed to be spirit agency. Miss Wood solemnly declares that she takes no active part in the manifestations. I have securely tied conjurers, who proposed to imitate spirit manifestations. In many cases the imitations were really good, and deserved credit, but they tell you that what they do is pure trickery, which shrewd observers know and can imitate. Spirit manifestations can easily be imitated and burlesqued, but the conditions under which they are done are as different as a candle is to the sun.

The two sittings given to the members of the Cape Town Mesmeric and Psychological Society, under test conditions, thoroughly convinced every sitter (about thirty-five or forty). The materialised form came outside the curtain, and at request waved its arm, as it had no power to speak on this occasion; took a bell from off the table and rang it, in order to prove that our senses—eyes—were not deceiving us. It came out at one corner of the curtains, and, by urgent request, moved round to the front of the extemporised cabinet, and entered at the middle aperture, opened the curtains and shewed another spirit form. Pocha informed us the magnetic conditions and mental emanations of the sitters were exceedingly good, and if they could but sit for eight or ten times several spirit forms could come out simultaneously, walk about the room, and allow themselves to be touched. In most scientific circles the magnetic and mental conditions act on the spirit forms like flames of fire would on human beings. Of course tyros cannot understand conditions and ridicule those who insist upon keeping them. When we have professors to instruct the masses about the science of spirit intercourse and the philosophy of materialisation, the public mind will become wiser. Till then private workers can only go on quietly and hope for more light.

Miss Wood and Mr. Defries hope to return to Cape Town in fifteen months.

This visit of Miss Wood was not professional, and no one paid a farthing for what they saw. God bless this and all other true mediums, prays yours, in love and truth,

BERKS T. HUTCHINSON.

Bell Ringing.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—In reference to the bell ringing by spirits, reported in your valuable paper, I take the liberty to bring under your notice what happened at and preceding my father's death at Naples some forty years ago.

To properly understand what I am about to relate, it is necessary to state that the apartments of which we were then the tenants, were the first floor of a hotel, having on the landing two doors, each provided with a bell.

My father's bedroom was at the furthest end of the apartments, and at the head of the bed there was a bell rope attached to a bell which was used to summon the servants in case of need.

This bell was out of any person's reach, my father excepted. One day the latter, only forty-eight years old and enjoying good health, was suddenly taken ill, not seriously, but enough to be obliged to keep to his bed. Three or four days after, in the morning, the bell of one of the doors was heard ringing, but on inquiry no person had rung it, and we thought that some other tenants had pulled it by mistake. A little while afterwards the same bell rang again, apparently by invisible means.

This was repeated twice, with the same result, and my father began to get fidgety, and in order to put an end to what he thought was a joke, ordered the servant to take away the bell ropes. Scarcely had the rope been removed when the other door bell rang in its turn. This rope was also removed, but, strange to say, the bell continued ringing. My father became thoughtful, and directed the servants to pull down both the bells. As soon as this order was executed the bell of the rope of which hung at the head of my father's bed, rang violently. My father then said to me, "I know what that means; replace the bells at the doors." The bells were replaced, and rang no more. My father, though not feeling any worse, called in his notary, made his will, and gave me, the eldest son, the directions necessary for the management of the family affairs. Ten days later he died.

I give you a story of simple fact.—I remain, yours sincerely,
BARON T. SPEDALIERE, F.T.S.

"Astrology"

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—As an humble student of astral science, allow me a word in defence of this subject. "S." evidently not having thoroughly investigated the science (if he had he would not require the opinion of the spirit world as to its truth), gives your readers a communication from "the other side." And the spirit or intelligence seems to know about as much as "S." himself; the remarks about being born at the Vernal Equinox, and the effects upon the human organism in consequence, are beside the question, but to shew that, as on earth, so in the realm of spirit, intelligences differ widely, according to their degree of knowledge of truth, I give a few brief paragraphs from a trance communication given in the Banner of Light, August 17th, 1861, on the subject of astrology.

"Astrology may be called the foundation of all the sciences. Astrology may also be called the index of all things found upon this material plane."

"Out of this science grew all the religions and philosophies of the past."

"Mortals know but little as to how much they are controlled, bound, held, each in their respective spheres, by the different planets which people the universe."

"Each and every planet has its direct and positive influence upon each and every human being."

"Astrology! What a mighty subject! So mighty that the few brief remarks we have given you are not to one ten thousandth degree fitted to touch upon a single point of the subject."

Had "S." examined his own horoscope and noted the time of directions, and then compared them with the events of life, he would not ask anyone's opinion as to how far they agree with such communications from the other side as he has given to the readers of "LIGHT." For the benefit of F. W. Thurston, M.A., I give the following astrological data of the Royal but unfortunate Bourbon family. The horoscopes of these persons should prove to any sceptical mind that there may be "some truth in astrology."

Louis XVI., Aug. 23, 1754, 6.24 a.m.—Mars rising, Uranus setting, Saturn in sesquiquadrate, with the Sun also afflicting the Moon, and the latter thus rendered malefic, in square with the Sun again.

Marie Antoinette, Nov. 2, 1775, 7.30 p.m.—Uranus approaching the meridian in sesquiquadrate with the Sun, the Moon exactly between Saturn and Mars.

Louis XVII., March 7, 1785, 7 p.m.—Uranus in square with the Sun.

Princess Elizabeth (guillotined), May 3, 1764, 2 a.m.—Mars culminating, Saturn in conjunction with the Sun.

Louis XVIII., Nov. 17, 1755, 4 a.m.—Mars in conjunction with the meridian, Saturn in opposition to both, but Jupiter rising; therefore, after all his vicissitudes of fortune, he died upon the throne.

Charles X., Oct. 9, 1757, 7 p.m.—Saturn and Uranus in conjunction near the meridian, in square to Jupiter, Mars in opposition to the meridian. No favourable indication of any kind.

Duke de Bordeaux, Sept. 29, 1820, 2.35 a.m.—Saturn in opposition to the Sun.

Duchess of Parma (his sister), Sept. 21, 1819, 6.35 a.m.—Mars in conjunction with the meridian, Saturn in opposition to the Sun.

Duke of Angoulême, Aug. 6, 1775, 3.45 p.m.—Mars and Saturn in conjunction with the meridian, in square with Uranus, and all three in semi-square with the Sun.

Duchess of Angoulême, Dec. 19, 1778, 11.25 a.m.—Uranus in opposition to both the Sun and the meridian.

Duke de Berri (assassinated), Jan. 24, 1778, 11.15 a.m.—The Sun in square and the Moon in opposition to Uranus.

Louis Philippe, Oct. 6, 1773, 9.40 a.m.—Saturn culminating, afflicting the Moon, but also indications of good fortune.

Duke de Nemours, Oct. 25, 1814, 5 p.m.—Saturn culminating.

Prince de Joinville, Aug. 14, 1818, 1.40 p.m.—Mars in conjunction with the meridian, Saturn in opposition to both.

Duke D'Anmale, April 26, 1822, 6.15 p.m.—Mars culminating in sesquiquadrate with Uranus.

Duke de Montpensier, July 31, 1834, 5.10 p.m.—Saturn culminating, but Jupiter in good aspect with the meridian; and the fact is, that the Duke having become a Spanish Prince by marriage, suffered comparatively little by the revolution.

Princess Clementine of Gotha, June 3, 1817, 1.40 a.m.—Has not one indication of evil in her horoscope, and she has been entirely exempt from the misfortunes of the family.

Count de Paris, Aug. 24, 1838, 2.45 p.m.—The Sun afflicted by all the malefics.

It may be added that these times of birth are all derived from official documents, which may be inspected in the British Museum, and were printed in the Spectator a few years ago.—Yours respectfully,

Z.

Astrology.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I must hasten to disclaim any sort of agreement with the views of the correspondent, quoted by "S." in his letter in "LIGHT" this week.

Nor is my own conclusion about astrology merely that there is a vague "something" in it. I believe very much in it, though I would not undertake to tell anyone's future specifically by means of it. What I am at present aiming at is an inductive demonstration of the elements of the science; to shew a more or less constant correspondence between individual character and the general outlines, at least, of the individual life, with planetary positions at birth.

Certainly I have more confidence in these positions as an indication character than as an indication of fortune. I should not, for instance, anticipate downfall or disgrace from the presence of Saturn in the tenth house with as much confidence as I should predicate excitability or irascibility of temperament from certain aspects of Mars to the moon. On the other hand, I cannot be so sure of the converse; that is, that given the character, the appropriate aspects will be found in the nativity.

I may mention that I have now received a very large additional number of birthdays of insane patients, upon which I hope soon to report.

I have to thank Mr. Thurston for his very interesting letter in "LIGHT" of November 3rd. I have the horoscopes of nearly all the Royal Family, including the second generation, and on another occasion will supplement Mr. Thurston's list. I am glad to see that his method is the same as my own, to consider the comparative chances of the testimonies to occur.

As regards affliction of the moon in cases of insanity, I do not exclude it, but only defer its examination for the present. Suppose A B C to be alternative causes or concomitants of D, then in the class denoted by D, I should expect to find more cases of each A, B, and C than the chance-average would allow; though neither one of them with anything like uniformity. For the purpose of simplifying the calculation I take one of the alternatives at a time—that is all. I am quite alive to the distinction Mr. Thurston calls attention to, between the effects peculiar to affliction of the moon and those denoted by the affliction of Mercury.

And I can find no expression of my own meaning and belief more apt than that which is to be found in the last paragraph of Mr. Thurston's letter. Reserving further comments on his valuable contribution, I will only now express my satisfaction that the subject has engaged his attention.

EXTRAORDINARY STORIES.

Our Shrewsbury correspondent writes: "In the neighbourhood of Wem, a town on the Shrewsbury and Crewe branch of the London and North-Western Railway, some unaccountable proceedings are reported. At Wood's Farm, four miles from Wem, occupied by Mr. Hampson, his wife, two children, and two female servants, on Thursday last, while the family were just about to sit down to tea, at four p.m., when it was still daylight, a saucepan suddenly jumped off the fire, and this was followed by the tea things being swept off the table and smashed. Several pieces of burning coal were then hurled off the fire, set the clothing of an infant four months old in flames, and before the clothes could be removed the child was severely burnt on the hand and arm, and its hair was singed off its head. A small American clock on the mantelpiece was next dashed violently to the ground, and several other articles on the mantelpiece were also thrown down and broken. Something was thrown against the face of a large cased clock, and shattered the glass and face, and a lamp globe and chimney were smashed. The mat of the lamp took fire from a piece of burning coal falling on it, and a basket on the parlour table was also discovered in flames. The neighbours were fetched in, amongst them being Mr. Lea, a neighbouring farmer, Police-constable Bowen, and others, and although the smashing of crockery and the hurling of articles from one side of the room to the other continued, they could not discover the cause. Mr. Lea and Police-constable Bowen were both struck by things thrown by an unseen agency. It was feared that the house would be set on fire by the burning coal, and consequently the fire was removed from the grate and the furniture from the house. All went outside, but several things were flung from the inside through the windows. In the kitchen six panes of glass were broken and several in the parlour. Strict inquiries have been made by the police and others, but there appears to be no elucidation of the mystery. Mr. Hampson says he cannot account for it unless it is something in the coal; but the coal could not throw articles about the room. The affair has caused considerable talk in the neighbourhood, and a great amount of incredulity is expressed. Our correspondent, who personally visited the house, adds that the accounts of the occurrence were received from several eye-witnesses.—Daily Telegraph.

"A sequel to the extraordinary occurrence at The Woods, Loppington, near Shrewsbury, happened on Thursday at the village of Weston Fullenfield, about two miles from Mr. Hampson's farm, and is sufficiently conclusive to confirm the events that took place there early in the week. It appears the servant, Emma Davies, who resided with the Hampsons, was discharged, the farmer and his wife feeling anything but comfortable at her presence. On Thursday the girl went to assist Mrs. Jones, a neighbour, to wash the household linen, but had not long been engaged in this occupation when the bucket in which she was washing jumped about the house, throwing water and clothes in all directions, the family Bible and other books placed on a side table narrowly escaping the flames. On attempting to pick them up a boot flew over the girl's head, striking the mantelpiece. Later on, when both women went out to place the clothes on the hedge for drying, those that the girl placed jumped over into the road. Mrs. Jones, getting alarmed, ordered the girl home. On arriving there, her presence induced a lump of coal to leap from the fire across the room to a table, and the flower-pots in the window also behaved in an extraordinary manner. The girl shortly afterwards went out to fetch her father, but before proceeding far she became very ill, and fell down in the road. She was conveyed back to her home, and a physician called in." The same correspondent, in a later telegram, says: "I visited Weston Fullenfield yesterday afternoon for the purpose of inquiring into the extraordinary occurrence in connection with the young girl Emma Davies, and found sufficient evidence to confirm every detail of the remarkable event. The girl, who is in her thirteenth year, resides in the village with her parents. On returning to her home last evening the household and other articles commenced moving about in all directions and most mysterious manner, which continued during the night. Six panes of glass were broken in the room, and outside the greatest disorder prevailed. In the front and on the side of the house were strewn broken bricks, crockery, glass, stones, &c., which could not be accounted for in any way. One woman was struck with a stone 150 yards off. Another, who was in the house, received a wound on the arm from a knife passing her, and an ulster belonging to the girl had every button torn from it in the room. A number of the Shropshire constabulary visited the premises to-day to investigate the extraordinary circumstances, but were unable to solve the mystery. The girl was made to do some household work, but nothing unusual was observable. The vicar of the parish, the Rev. Mr. Tuke, visited the house last evening, and read and engaged in prayer. Dr. Corke, of Baschurch, was called in to-day, and made a close examination of the girl, but was unable to obtain much information from her. He stated she was in a very excitable and nervous state, but was not designing. The matter is causing the greatest excitement throughout the whole neighbourhood, and much superstition prevails in the village."—Daily Telegraph.

A Shrewsbury correspondent telegraphs that he paid another visit to Weston Fullenfield yesterday, and was informed that on Saturday and Sunday there were further extraordinary manifestations in association with the girl Emma Davies. Taylor, of the Shropshire constabulary, remained in the house until late on Saturday. During the time he was there, it is stated that the fender moved from the fireplace into the middle of the room, and on being replaced came forward a second and third time. A cushion placed at the back of a chair on which the girl sat several times flew across the room, and all the stitches in her apron became undone, followed later on by the buttons upon her dress being wrenched off. Miss Maddox, the village schoolmistress, made a statement to the correspondent to the effect that she called to see the girl, a former pupil, on Saturday evening, and had not long been seated when she observed both the chair and the girl rise from the floor. She took the girl on her lap and sat in the chair herself, and immediately the girl's boots flew off, and although replaced, the circumstance was twice repeated. On Sunday, it is added, a box in a bedroom was hurled across the room, and a number of cups and saucers were smashed.—Daily Telegraph.

A GHOSTLY VISITOR.—A New York telegram dated October 11th, says: Under Sheriff Thos. Brown, of Richmond county, makes an affidavit that on Monday night, while sleeping with friends in his billiard-room at Stapleton, L., the ghost of Reinhardt, executed for murder some time ago, appeared to the party. They fled in confusion. His statement is corroborated by the others.

TESTIMONY TO PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

The following is a list of eminent persons who, after personal investigation, have satisfied themselves of the reality of some of the phenomena generally known as Psychical or Spiritualistic.

N.B.—An asterisk is prefixed to those who have exchanged belief for knowledge.

SCIENCE.—The Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, F.R.S., President R.A.S.; W. Crookes, Fellow and Gold Medallist of the Royal Society; C. Varley, F.R.S., C.E.; A. R. Wallace, the eminent Naturalist; W. F. Barrett, F.R.S.E., Professor of Physics in the Royal College of Science, Dublin; Dr. Lockhart Robertson; *Dr. J. ## Is It Conjuring?

It is sometimes confidently alleged that mediums are only clever conjurers, who easily deceive the simple-minded and unwary. But how, then, about the conjurers themselves, some of the most accomplished of whom have declared that the "manifestations" are utterly beyond the resources of their art?

ROBERT HOUDIN, the great French conjurer, investigated the subject of clairvoyance with the sensitive, Alexis Didier. In the result he unreservedly admitted that what he had observed was wholly beyond the resources of his art to explain. See "Psychische Studien" for January, 1878, p. 43.

PROFESSOR JACOBS, writing to the editor of Licht, Mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—"As a Prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the mediumistic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect. Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. . . . Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also 'the individuality of the spirit' in Spiritual manifestation."

SAMUEL BELLACHINI, COURT CONJURER AT BERLIN.—I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butleroff, in St. Petersburg; to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the "How" of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a Notary and witnesses.—(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI, Berlin, December 6th, 1877.

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By M.A. (Oxon.)

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two, of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex; the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential; and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cool breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitching of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over but not in contact with it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous, and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form-manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly—Try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning Spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your Reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good, and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M.A. (Oxon.)"

A contention that is now going on among Spiritualists in America has caused Hudson Tuttle to make some remarks in a recent number of the Religio-Philosophical Journal on "The Trance and its Responsibility." It is not necessary to detail the particulars of the dispute which gave rise to his paper. In such cases all personal matters are best avoided. Roughly put the case was this. A medium, speaking on a public platform, in what purported to be a state of trance, made some remarks which were understood to reflect on the practice of a certain medical man. These remarks were said to be inspired by the spirit of the person whose life had been terminated prematurely by the doctor's alleged mal-practice. The question was hotly taken up by the doctor, who threatened the medium with castigation. How far is the medium to be held responsible? To this question in its broad bearings Mr. Tuttle addresses himself. He brings to its discussion a long personal experience, and habits of clear thought which are rare among those who are similarly gifted with himself.

Professing a tender sympathy with mediums in their very difficult position, and giving a very high estimate of the dignity of that position when honourably filled, as well as its awful prostitution "when the Divine gift is sold in the market or bartered in trade," Mr. Tuttle goes on to point out that there have always been two broadly-defined classes in Spiritualism. One accepts everything without question, and regards the medium as an irresponsible agent. The other is ready to censure the medium, if need be, and to hold him responsible for his words and actions. The former is the larger class; the latter is most in accord with the law. Can either of these extreme positions be unreservedly accepted? Before I proceed to analyse Mr. Tuttle's reply, I may be permitted to say that I find myself in entire accord with what he says at the outset of his remarks. We are speaking, be it remembered, of public trance mediums, and his remarks are applicable to that phase of the subject only. We shall find that Mr. Tuttle recognises in the further course of this paper the difference between the usually imperfect trance of the speaker on a public platform, and that fully established state of trance where the ordinary avenues of sense are absolutely sealed up. But it is necessary to bear the distinction in mind throughout.

Mr. Tuttle enters into a disquisition on the nature of the trance-state. Starting from the analogy of the control exercised by the mesmeriser over his subject, and noting the transference of ideas especially, he shews that the controlling spirit and the medium occupy precisely similar positions in relation to each other. In a passage which is valuable because it expresses the practical experience of one who has had large opportunity for observation, Mr. Tuttle points out, what I entirely concur in, the impossibility of comprehending the blending of one's own passive mind with the energising intelligence that is gradually controlling it. The analogy of sleep which he adduces is exact. There is a point of time when the observer is conscious, or thinks he is, of what is going on around him, and when he believes himself capable of analysing his own sensations. The next moment is oblivion. So with the trance. The controlling influence may be resisted: the control may be imperfectly established, so that blurred impressions are conveyed, the sense of relative proportion is lost, "men are seen as trees walking," and the result is grotesque confusion; or it may, under favourable conditions, be so established that the organism of the medium becomes the passive vehicle for conveying the ideas of the controlling intelligence with little or no adulteration. Such a perfect state of trance is rare; it depends on the presence of most harmonious conditions in the circle, and also, (a point which is often left out of consideration) on the influence of a powerful controlling spirit who is not merely beneficent and well-intentioned, pure and truthful, but who has the knowledge and power to give effect to his good intentions. The blunders made in conveying information by such means as those now under discussion are, I believe, rarely intentional. They are attributable largely to the imperfection of the instrument, and to the inefficiency of the performer.

Mr. Tuttle's remarks are worth study:—

"A spirit wishes to communicate through a medium and chooses the trance state to do so. That the communication be correct, the medium must be under the control of the spirit, and the more absolutely, the more perfectly the communication will be expressed. I think no one, who has not experienced this sensitive state, can fully comprehend the delicate blending of the mind of the medium with the controlling mind. I have watched closely the approach of this state, as I would that of natural sleep, but as in the latter at the final moment, when consciousness is overborne, the ability to observe is lost, and that, too, by necessity of the overlapping state of sleep, so at a certain point the ability to observe the approaching trance is lost. By effort the subject may stop at any of the stages, receiving more or less perfectly the thoughts and feelings of the controlling spirit, but if he pass on to the perfect state he loses the power of choice. To avoid misunderstanding, let me say that trance has two meanings: one wherein the quickened spiritual senses, freed from the fetters of the physical senses, spurn earthly limitations, and the subject becomes able to perceive spiritual things, as it would if freed from the body. The other is a sensitive state, very similar, which enables others to express their individuality. The latter may be called mediumistic trance, and is the one under consideration. Its essential character is unconsciousness to impressions through the physical senses. No sound penetrates the ear to the auditory nerves. The eye is insensible to light, and the nerves of feeling do not respond to exciting causes. Another essential condition to a perfect expression of the controlling spirit's thought is absolute control by such spirit."

It is abundantly evident to those who have had experience of the perfect trance state, the delicacy of the conditions required for its establishment, the isolation of the medium from any influence even of a favourable kind, the perfectly healthy state of mind and body required in him, to say nothing of atmospheric and other conditions, as well as the perfectly harmonious state of the circle:—it must be clear, I say, that this state cannot be reckoned on whenever an oration is to be delivered, or "tests" are required by a mixed audience. Mr. Tuttle, I see, is of the same opinion. "Such state," he says, "can rarely be attained." It is impossible for us to say what control a spirit may get over a medium that has been so controlled habitually and for a long period. We know that a powerful mesmerizer can do almost anything with a familiar "subject." It is not safe, therefore, to say that such perfect control is impossible on a public platform, but only that it is presumably rare. The utterances of an average trance-medium are usually imperfect expressions of spirit-thought, as Mr. Tuttle says. The medium "remains partially conscious, holding himself with dread from the full surrender of self-consciousness," or the control is imperfectly established.

This being so, Mr. Tuttle proceeds to estimate the responsibility of the medium so placed:—

"When we accept this view of mediumship, its responsibility has a new meaning. The surrender, even partially, of our self-control to another and irresponsible being, is a great sacrifice and fills us with dread. We become responsible before the world for the force to which we yield. We must in that force repose implicit trust, knowing that the same law which allows pure and holy thoughts to be expressed, under favourable conditions will allow to the opposite equal facilities. Hence we learn to appreciate the importance of so ordering the conduct of life, as to make favourable conditions only for the good and true spiritual influences. We also learn why yielding to whatever influence may come, the outgrowth of sitting in promiscuous circles, or giving public sances to any one who demands, or is willing to pay therefor, ultimately debauches and leads to spiritual ruin."

There can be no doubt in the mind of any skilled observer that these are words of wisdom and truth. The responsibility must fall on the medium who encourages the controlling spirit, and who offers an adit to any spirit that is able to approach. It may well be that a medium may unjustly suffer, a helpless victim of conditions that have produced what he must answer for. So it is in this world. "As in civil life, it is expected of all to understand the law, so here those subject to mediumship are expected to understand its laws and conditions, and are held responsible if they do not." It cannot be otherwise, however great the injustice that may be done in isolated cases; and no attempts of ours can alter what is an all-pervading law.

The notion that is sometimes put forward that a medium should be the channel for every kind of influence, and has no right, if he has the power, to pick and choose, is thus dealt with:—

"I well know that many true and noble Spiritualists hold that it is necessary for all classes of spirits to communicate with earth, and therefore mediums should be willing to yield to their influence, however low or vile it may be. With all due deference I wholly disagree with them, and hold that the less of such undeveloped influence that is brought to bear the better. That sensitives must be brought in contact with characters which in this life would produce disgust, and be dragged by them to their own level, that they may thereby communicate their crude and impure ideas, is not only an unjust, but a most pernicious conception. It opens wide the door for the justification of any crime or villainy the medium, true or false, may commit. It offers atonement for all his shortcomings. I by no means desire to accept a spiritual philosophy which makes a great class of its teachers the cat's paws of the undisciplined, undeveloped, vile and vicious, without even a shadow of gain thereby. The presence of such spiritual beings cannot be prevented, but they may be excluded from the sacred vestibule of the soul. Their presence there signifies a similarity which attracts instead of repels between medium and spirit."

I have repeatedly had earth-bound spirits come to me requesting prayer, and surely they should not be sent empty away. I have known many cases where spirits have been raised by association with those whom they found at a circle. They breathed, as it were, a higher spiritual atmosphere, and were benefited. I have heard and read of cases in which degraded spirits came and controlled a medium, and made the mouth of a pure-minded girl the outlet of curses and impurity. These were gradually tamed, reasoned with, touched with shame, and rescued from their sad state. And I have heard and known of other cases where such masterful spirits, once in possession, have been beyond reach, and have become obsessing spirits, to the great misery and hurt of the medium. It is a difficult question.

Some, like the Theosophists, discountenancing mediumship altogether, will tell us that if we leave open the door of our house we must expect unwelcome tenants. If we lock the door, we shall not be troubled. Perhaps so: though I suppose the analogy of the burglar is not inapposite. But that does not seem to me the most excellent way, though it is best adapted to secure a selfish security. Others, with Mr. Tuttle, would warn off as intruders all who do not come up to a certain standard of suitability, to be determined, I presume, by themselves. I cannot regard this as consonant with the highest spiritual or moral development even among men. It being granted that we can aid and raise these lower spirits, it becomes to me clearly a duty to make the attempt. Even in the slums and courts, whence "The bitter cry of outcast London" goes up with such ceaseless vehemence, the ministers of mercy do not stop to think whether they may perchance soil their clothes, or even risk a fever. If the philanthropy even of this world of ours were calculated on lines of selfish caution, most of it would die, and the rest would be robbed of half its attractiveness. It would be at best but a puny starveling, a mean caricature of the all-embracing, self-sacrificing love that casts its halo round the Pattern Life. This calculating caution is out of place when we deal with these high matters. Given the possibility of success, the risk must be run. There are, no doubt, merely malignant spirits who must be repressed, or even repelled—loafing earth-wanderers, seeking only to confound and confuse us, who need not be encouraged. But few are beyond reach of kindness, sympathy, and prayer, and they have a right to it in virtue of the responsibility which the medium accepts in the exercise of his gift, and which we share. As we have a right on our part to hold him responsible for what is done in his presence by the invisible agencies that he attracts, so they have their claims on us which we have no right to put aside.* In this point I venture to differ with Mr. Tuttle. In the main gist of his remarks I agree substantially.

M.A. (OXON.)

* A very apposite passage may be quoted from the experiences of William Howitt as detailed in Mrs. Howitt Watts' recent "Pioneers of the Spiritual Reformation," p. 250:—"It appeared to us evident that there were plenty of disembodied spirits roaming about the confines of earth in a very low state, and as it would seem, under very little surveillance. Some of these spirits would say, on my questioning who and what they were, that they were no spirits known to us; that they simply had seen a light in passing, and had come in. Some professed to be in a state of darkness and of desolation. On asking whether we should pray for them, some declined, saying that they did not want to be better, and did not expect to be happier, for they did not love Christ, and Christ did not love them. We sometimes reminded them of the Prodigal Son, and sometimes read the parable to them. Some then said that they felt better, and were comforted; others, that they were no better, and had no hope, and did not want to have any. Others said that they were very unhappy, and wandering in darkness through the waste places of creation. They desired our prayers, and expressed themselves benefited by them, and came again and again. Some of the good spirits who frequently came, said that they had to descend into the lower regions to endeavour to reclaim and bring up spirits, the spirits of their relatives sometimes; that these were most painful missions, for they were obliged to put themselves in a manner into the condition of those that they sought to benefit and raise; and to pass amongst crowds of low, malign, and vulgar spirits, who mocked and jeered and insulted them, and did all in their power to prevent any of the spirits they sought to reclaim following them or listening to them. They said that as Christ had suffered in His endeavour to save souls, both on Earth and in Hades, so all who followed Christ had to suffer in degree in the same labours of reclamation. Some spirits, they said, had sunk so low that they had lost not only almost all desire for becoming better, but even were fallen into a condition of only partial animation."

SPIRITUALISM IN NEW ZEALAND.*

It would require a volume to describe the intricacies of Maori mythology, in which gods, men, demons, monsters, heroes, and spirits of the dead, are the actors. The mythology of these islanders is not less diffuse or complicated than that of the ancient Greeks. But the vivid ideality and poetic fantasies of the Greek mind, are no marvel, because they emanate from the Greeks.

The endless convolutions of uncurbed fancy by which the Greeks impersonated the powers of nature, are of course admirable, because they originate in Grecian ideality, and are labelled "classical lore."

The Maori sings, believes, and teaches, all that the Greek classics enshrine, but alas! his legends only bear the opprobrious name of "savage superstitions." Read, however, the Rev. Richard Taylor's TE KĀ A MAUI, from which our extracts are taken, and the difference between "classical lore" and "savage superstitions" will seem very slight; in fact, the greatest marvel of all is, where either Greek or Maori got their ideality from? Amidst the mythological personages of New Zealand, "the spirits of the dead" ever play a very prominent part, and our chief interest in noticing the Maoris at all lies in the fact that belief in, and open communion with, these spirits still exists. The priests or "Tohungas" are unmistakably "mediums," in the modern sense of the term. Sometimes they are born with their gift, and sometimes they are devoted to the priestly office by their parents, and acquire their powers after the fashion of Eastern ecstasies, by prayer, fasting, and contemplation.

That good prophets exist amongst the Maoris has been abundantly proved, even to the cold materialistic government that has absorbed their country. During the time when Great Britain busied herself in appropriating New Zealand, on the plea of a "discovery," her officials frequently wrote home, that the Maori would never be conquered wholly; information of the parties sent out to attack them; the very colour of the boats, and the hour when they would arrive; the number of the enemy, and all particulars essential to their safety, being invariably communicated to the tribes beforehand, by their prophets or Tohungas.

The state of preparation in which the English found "the savages" fully verified this claim, and proved the fact of prevision, affirmed to exist amongst them.

The best natural prophets and seers amongst the Maoris are, as amongst the Spiritualists, of the female sex; and although the missionaries try to account for the marvellous powers they exhibit, above all, for the sound of the spirit voice, which is a common phase in their communion with the dead, on the hypothesis that the women who practise "the arts of sorcery," are ventriloquists, this attempted explanation rarely covers the ground of the intelligence which is received.

The author has herself had several proofs of the mediumistic power possessed by these "savages," but as her experiences may be deemed of too personal a character, we shall select our examples from other sources. One of these is furnished by a Mr. Marsden, a person who was well known in the early days of New Zealand's colonial history as a miner, who grew rich "through spiritual communications." Mr. Marsden was a gentleman who had spent much time amongst the Maoris, and who still keeps a residence in "the King's country," that is, the district of which they hold control.

Mr. Marsden informed the author that his success as a gold miner was entirely due to a communication he had received through a native woman, who claimed to have the power of bringing down spirits—the Maoris, be it remembered, always insisting that the spirits descend through the air to earth, to visit mortals.

Mr. Marsden had long been prospecting unsuccessfully in the gold regions. He had a friend in partnership with him, to whom he was much attached, but who had been accidentally killed by a fall from a cliff.

The spirit of this man came unsolicited, on an occasion when Mr. Marsden was consulting a native seeress, for the purpose of endeavouring to trace out what had become of a valuable watch which he had lost.

The voice of the spirit was first heard in the air, apparently above the roof of the hut in which they sat, calling Mr. Marsden by his familiar name of "Mars." Greatly startled by these sounds, several times repeated, at the medium's command, he remained perfectly still until the voice of his friend speaking in his well-remembered Scotch accent sounded close to his ear, whilst a column of grey misty substance reared itself up by his side. This apparition was plainly visible in the subdued light of the hut, to which there was only one open entrance, but no window. Though he was much startled by what he saw and heard, Mr. Marsden had presence of mind enough to gently put his hand through the misty column, which remained intact, as if its substance offered no resistance to the touch. Being admonished by an earnest whisper from the Maori woman, who had fallen on her knees before the apparition, to keep still, he obeyed, when a voice—seemingly from an immense distance off—yet speaking unmistakably in his friend's Scotch accents, advised him to let the watch alone—for it was irreparably gone—but to go to the stream on the banks of which they had last had a meal together; trace it up for six miles and a half, and then, by following its course amidst the forest, he should come to a pile, which would make him rich, if he chose to remain so.

Whilst he was waiting and listening breathlessly to hear more, Mr. Marsden was startled by a slight detonation at his side. Turning his head he observed that the column of mist was gone, and in its place, a quick flash, like the reflection of a candle, was all that he beheld. Here the séance ended, and the astonished miner left the hut, convinced that he had heard the spirit of his friend talking with him. He added, that he followed the directions given implicitly, and came to a mass of surface gold lying on the stones at the bottom of the brook in the depth of the forest. This he gathered up, and though he prospected for several days in and about the spot, he never found another particle of the precious metal. That which he had secured, he added, with a deep sigh, was indeed enough to have made him independent for life, had it not soon been squandered in fruitless speculations.

Several accounts are extant of Spiritualism amongst the Maoris, one of the most curious and graphic being a personal narrative, written by General Cummings, in a small volume called "Old New Zealand."

The party who lent this work for perusal to the author, was well acquainted with General Cummings, and vouched for his truth and reliability in every particular. Although the narrative we are about to quote has often been retailed in magazines and other periodicals, it was so thoroughly authenticated by the author's friend that we give it place once more in this volume, as an example of the kind of Spiritualism practised amongst the Maoris.

A popular young chief who had acquired a fair knowledge of the English language, and with whom General Cummings was very intimate, had been appointed registrar of births and deaths.

General Cummings occupied a portion of his office, but they were about to remove to a more convenient place, when the young Maori encountered a violent death. In changing the office the book of registries was missing, and much inconvenience was occasioned by its loss. A short time after the decease of his friend, General Cummings was informed that his relatives intended to invoke his spirit, and that as the "Pakeha" (white man) had been much beloved by him, he might, if he chose, be present.

Notwithstanding his inveterate scepticism, the General accepted this invitation, mentally resolving "to keep his ears and eyes wide open." The narrator then continues as follows:—

"The appointed time came. Fires were lit. The Tohunga repaired to the darkest corner of the room. All was silence, save the sobbing of the sisters of the deceased warrior-chief. There were thirty of us, sitting on the rush-strewn floor, the door shut, and the fire now burning down to embers. Suddenly there came a voice out from the partial darkness, 'Salutation, salutation to my family, to my tribe, to you, pakeha, my friend!' Our feelings were taken by storm. The oldest sister screamed, and rushed with extended arms in the direction from whence the voice came. Her brother, seizing her, restrained her by main force. Others exclaimed, 'Is it you? Is it you? truly it is you? ane! ane!' and fell, quite insensible, upon the floor. The older women, and some of the aged men, were not moved in the slightest degree, though believing it to be the spirit of the chief.

"Whilst reflecting upon the novelty of the scene, the 'darkness visible,' and the deep interest manifest, the spirit spoke again, 'Speak to me, my family: speak to me, my tribe: speak to me, the pakeha!' At last the silence gave way, and the brother spoke: 'How is it with you? Is it well with you in that country?' The answer came, though not in the voice of the Tohunga-medium, but in strange, sepulchral sounds: 'It is well with me: my place is a good place. I have seen our friends: they are all with me!' A woman from another part of the room now anxiously cried out, 'Have you seen my sister?' 'Yes, I have seen her: she is happy in our beautiful country.' 'Tell her my love so great for her will never cease.' 'Yes, I will bear the message.' Here the native woman burst into tears, and my own bosom swelled in sympathy.

"The spirit speaking again, giving directions about property and keepsakes, I thought I would more thoroughly test the genuineness of all this; and I said, 'We cannot find your book with the registered names; where have you concealed it?' The answer came instantly, 'I concealed it between the tahuhu of my house, and the thatch; straight over you, as you go in at the door.' The brother rushed out to see. All was silence. In five minutes he came hurriedly back, with the book in his hand! It astonished me.

"It was now late; and the spirit suddenly said, 'Farewell, my family, farewell, my tribe: I go.' Those present breathed an impressive farewell; when the spirit cried out again, from high in the air, 'Farewell!'

"This, though seemingly tragical, is in every respect literally true. But what was it? ventriloquism? the devil? or what? . . ."

PARIS.—A correspondent of the Banner of Light says:—The Society for Spiritual Culture, that Allan Kardec founded here, holds regular meetings which are well attended, at Leymarie's Hall, No. 5, Rue des Petits Champs; it is a large, bright, cheerful, airy room, containing a bust of Allan Kardec, also a fine organ. That highly accomplished and popular lecturer on the Spiritual platform, Mr. W. J. Colville, formerly of your city, spoke here to an appreciative and intelligent audience, on Sunday, Sept. 9th.; he was assisted by Mme. de Morcier, a devoted Spiritualist and medium, as well as a hard worker in the lecture-field.

DEPARTURE OF MISS LOTTIE FOWLER.—Miss Lottie Fowler finds herself compelled, through family circumstances, to return to America for a time, and is anxious to be of as much service to Spiritualists as possible, previous to her departure. She is therefore prepared to break her journey to Liverpool at any place on or near the way, staying two or three days at a place. We know of no medium more deserving of support than Miss Fowler. She has, we are glad to say, always been in the habit of refusing to exercise her gift promiscuously, and has steadily declined to exhaust and abuse her mediumship by continual sitting to all callers, no matter how many. Consequently she has obtained good results and almost invariably given satisfaction to those who have consulted her. Miss Fowler will give three sittings a day, each of an hour's duration. One person only allowed at each sitting. In the evening a more general seance will be given. We cordially commend Miss Fowler to the attention of provincial Spiritualists. Her address is 60; Mount-street, Grosvenor-square, W.

Whilst "The Strange Freaks" occurring near Shrewsbury are occupying public attention, it may be as well to consider the strange "freaks" of similar character which have already been placed on record.

The Polter-geist.

I.

In the introduction of his novel of Woodstock, Sir Walter Scott gives at considerable length, under three versions, an account of most extraordinary disturbances, apparently of the Polter-geist class. The mysterious circumstances thus recorded are said to have taken place at Woodstock in the year 1649. The first account is extracted from Hone's Every-Day Book, in which an article from the British Magazine for 1747 is quoted relative to a tract entitled "The Genuine Theology of the Good Devil of Woodstock, famous in the world in the year 1649, and never accounted for or at all understood at the time." Secondly, Scott, in the Appendix No. I., gives in full, a satirical poem, entitled "The Woodstock Scuffle, or most dreadful apparitions that were late seen in the Manner-house of Woodstock neere Oxford, to the great terror and wonderful amazement of all there that did behold them." (Printed in the year 1649, 4to.). And, thirdly, in Appendix No. II., "The Just Devil of Woodstock, or a true narrative of the several apparitions, the frights and punishments, inflicted upon the rumpish Commissioners sent thither to survey the manners and houses belonging to His Majesty." (London: Printed in the year 1660, 4to.).

It is to this third and most circumstantial of the narratives, that we would draw special attention.

"There is," says Scott, in his introduction, "no doubt that, in the year 1649, a number of incidents, supposed to be supernatural, took place at the King's palace of Woodstock, which the Commissioners of Parliament were then and there endeavouring to dilapidate and destroy. The account of this by the Commissioners themselves, or under their authority, was repeatedly published, and in particular, is inserted as relation sixth of 'Satan's Invisible World Discovered,' by George Sinclair, Professor of Philosophy in Glasgow, an approved collector of such tales.

"It was the object of neither of the great political parties of that day to discredit this narrative, which gave great satisfaction both to the Cavaliers and Roundheads; the former conceiving that the license given to the demons, was in consequence of the impious desecration of the King's furniture and apartments, so that the citizens of Woodstock almost adored the supposed spirits, as avengers of the cause of Royalty; while the friends of the Parliament, on the other hand, imputed to the malice of the fiend the obstruction of the pious work, as they judged that which they had in hand."

Scott furnishes us with the following description of the scene of the supposed haunting, extracted from a "Short Survey of Woodstock—not taken by any of the before named Commissioners." This survey of Woodstock is appended to the preceding pamphlet.

"The manner-house hath been a large fabrick, and accounted amongst his majestie's standing houses, because there was always kept a standing furniture. This great house was built by King Henry the First, but amplyfied with the gate-house and outsidies of the outer-court, by King Henry the Seventh, the stables by King James.

"About a bow-shot from the gate south-west, remain foundation signs of that structure, erected by King Henry the Second, for the security of Lady Rosamond, daughter of Walter Lord Clifford, which some poets have compared to the Dedalian labyrinth, but the form and circuit both of the place and ruins shew it to have been a house and of one pile, perhaps of strength, according to the fashion of those times."

In short, we perceive that the Manor House of Woodstock was as venerable and ancient an historical residence of kings as could well be found in any land, or in any era. The time, too, was one of revolution and of intermittent conflict, when the passions of men, high and low, had flamed up into the madness, not alone engendered by a simply political but also by a religious struggle. Conditions were prepared, therefore, for manifestation of spirit-power, with almost unexampled strength and universality; culminating, occasionally, in a coarseness such as corresponded with the brutality of the manners and inflamed passions of the lower actors in the great religious and political drama of the days of Cromwell. Every species of spiritual belief and all accounts of spirit manifestation both of the highest and of the lowest descriptions, are to be met with in England during the struggle of the seventeenth century—the preternatural was in the atmosphere breathed by all classes. The Polter-geist manifestations of low-spirit-presence we may therefore readily infer would not probably long be absent.

"And now as to the penman of this narrative, know that he was a divine, and, at the time of those things acted which are here related, the minister and schoolmaster of Woodstock; a person learned and discreet, not byassed with factious humours, his name Widows, who each day put in writing what he heard from their mouths (and such things as they told to have befallen them the night before), therein keeping to their own words.

The Just Devil of Woodstock.

"The 16th day of October, in the year of our Lord, 1649, the Commissioners for surveying and valuing his majestie's manor-house, parks, woods, deer, demesnes, and all things thereunto belonging, by name Captain Crook, Captain Hart, Captain Cockaine, Captain Carelesse, and Captain Roe, their messenger, with Mr. Browne, their secretary, and two or three servants, went from Woodstock town, (where they had lain some nights before), and took up their lodgings in his majestie's house after this manner: The bed-chamber and withdrawing-room they both lodged in and made their kitchen; the presence-chamber their room for dispatch of their business with all comers; of the council-hall their brew-house, as of the dining-room their wood-house, where they laid in the clefts of that antient standard in the High-Park, for many ages beyond memory known by the name of the King's Oak, which they had chosen out, and caused to be dug up by the roots.

"October 17. About the middle of the night, these new guests were first awaked by a knocking at the presence-chamber door, which they also conceived did open, and something to enter, which came through the room, and also walkt about that room with a heavy step during half-an-hour, then crept under the bed where Captain Hart and Captain Carelesse lay, where it did seem (as it were) to bite and gnaw the mat and bed-boards, as if it would tear and rend the feather beds; which having done a while, then would heave a while, and rest; then heave them up again in the bed more high than it did before, sometime on the one side, sometime on the other, as if it had tried which captain was heaviest. Thus having heaved some half an hour, from thence it walkt out and went under the servants' bed, and did the like to them; hence it walkt into a withdrawing-room, and there did the same to all who lodged there. Thus having welcomed them for more than two hours' space, it walkt out as it came in, and shut the outer door again, but with a clap of some mightie force. These guests were in a sweat all this while, but out of it falling into a sleep again, it became morning first before they spake their minds; then would they have it to be a dog, yet they described it more to the likeness of a great bear; so fell to the examining under the beds, where, finding only the mats scratcht, but the bed-boards whole, and the quarter of beef which lay on the floor untouched, they entertained other thoughts.

"October 18. They were all awaked as the night before, and now conceived that they heard all the great clefts of the King's Oak brought into the presence-chamber, and there thump down, and after roul about the room; they could hear their chairs and stools tost from one side of the room unto the other, and then (as it were) altogether jostled. Thus having done an hour together, it walkt into the withdrawing-room, where lodged the two captains, the secretary, and two servants: here stopt the thing a while, as if it did take breath, but raised a hideous one, then walkt into the bed-chamber, where lay those as before, and under the bed it went, where it did heave and heave again, that now they in bed were put to catch hold upon bed-posts, and sometimes one of the other, to prevent their being tumbled out upon the ground; then coming out as from under the bed, and taking hold upon the bed-posts, it would shake the whole bed, almost as if a cradle rocked. Thus having done here for half an hour, it went into the withdrawing-room, where first it came and stood at the bed's feet, and heaving up the bed's feet flopt down again a while, until at last it heaved the feet so high that those in bed thought to have been set upon their heads; and having thus for two hours entertained them, went out as in the night before, but with a great noise."

By DR. CHAZARAIN.

Dr. Chazarain's observations on the phenomena of materialisation witnessed by himself, communicated to our contemporary, Le Spiritisme (Paris), are now concluded. In his last paper he records phenomena presenting themselves at the last of the series of sances. At this there were more visitors to the circle than usual. Their presence, although friends, imported new conditions, and it was not until after a longer than usual delay that the curtains—suspended in an angle of the room to form a cabinet—were drawn aside from within. A female form was then seen in a kneeling posture, draped in white, with a veil on her head falling to her shoulders; she seemed about thirty-five years of age, and was very attenuated. Slowly rising, she advanced with faltering steps towards the middle of the semi-circle of sitters, where Madame J. and Monsieur S., her son-in-law, were seated. As she approached them her strength seemed to fail, and she retreated, as if drawn, backwards to the cabinet. In a few minutes she reappeared, turned to a lady, Madame R., seated next to the cabinet, and made a gesture for her assistance. Madame R. rose, the spirit took her arm and again approached Madame J.; but still unable to reach her, she once more retreated with faltering steps; to support her Madame R. hastily put her arm about her until she was within the curtains. Then, through the mouth of the medium—entranced, as usual during these manifestations—it was said that the spirit was anxious to shew herself to her mother and husband, but conditions were unfavourable. The friend who helped her was requested to remember that unexpected contact with the form disturbed the fluidic current existing between the spirit and the medium, which, if broken, might involve grave consequences to the latter.

The spirit then came out for the third time, motioned for Madame R. to permit her to place her hands upon the latter's shoulders, and thus approached Madame J. and Monsieur S. Recognised by the former as her daughter, and by the latter as his wife, she manifested the liveliest joy, embraced and kissed them.

On her return finally to the cabinet, the spirit who had, at previous sances, signed the name "Lermont," presented himself and wrote, in the same manner as previously, some verses of great beauty, twenty-four lines, on the subject of the continuance of love in spirit-life.

Dr. Chazarain concludes:—"Thus we find established, by our series of observations, the fact that by the light of a lamp, in the presence of twelve to fifteen persons,—under conditions precluding the possibility of deception,—and during five consecutive months, forms of men, women and children, having every appearance of living, acting, thinking human beings, have manifested themselves; that these forms walked alone, or with one or other of the persons present; have wound up a musical box; have brought and distributed flowers; have turned the light of a shaded lamp upon themselves and upon the circle; have touched, embraced, and sometimes spoken to one or other of those present; have written before our eyes, in prose and in poetry; and have given, by various means, proofs of their identity and of their real and intellectual life.

"The facts, of themselves, refute the notion, expressed by some, that such forms are doubles of the medium, being unlike her in size, form, countenance, colour of eyes, and apparent age, some of them, indeed, being infants.

"Such facts warrant Spiritualists in affirming spirit-materialisations and direct spirit-writing to be realities."

THE LONDON SPIRITUALIST ALLIANCE.

The committee which is now engaged in forming this Society, has issued the following circular to Spiritualists. We print it in extenso for the information of our readers:—

"The Council of the C.A.S. has addressed to the Members of that Society a circular intimating that it proposes to dissolve.

"At a Conference lately held at the instance of the Council of the C.A.S., I had the honour to propose a plan for the constitution of a Spiritualist Society, which should represent the views of old Spiritualists who do not now find themselves exactly represented by any existing Society. A Committee was formed for the purpose of giving effect to that suggestion; and it is proposed to call the new Society THE LONDON SPIRITUALIST ALLIANCE.

"It is, in the opinion of a large number of Spiritualists, very desirable that there should exist in the Metropolis a society of the kind proposed. There are, I am aware, various kindred societies already in existence. With these we shall be careful in no way to interfere; and with them we shall hope to work in harmony by friendly counsel and co-operation.

"But there are a number of Spiritualists who have been associated together at various kindred times during the past ten years, who, we believe, would desire to perpetuate or to resume that association under changed conditions adapted to changed times. Their faith has undergone no modification; and they consider this a fitting time to express it once more in union with those who are like-minded with themselves.

"For many divergent opinions on spiritual matters are now before the world. Never before was greater attention paid to the claims of Spiritualism. The Theosophical Society, at one extreme, expresses opinions and holds views in which Spiritualists, as a body, are not able fully to acquiesce. The Society for Psychical Research, while doing excellent work in its own way, is concerned solely, at present, with the external aspects of what is an infinitely vast subject. Under these circumstances it will always find a sphere of action distinct from that which we now contemplate.

"Between these poles, Spiritualists pure and simple, of a type that may now almost be called old-fashioned, find their place, and should take up their position, if they desire to be true to their convictions, and to do their duty in influencing public thought.

"Such a position will be in no sense aggressive. It will involve no large outlay, nor necessitate any pecuniary responsibility beyond the small subscription incident to membership.

"The plan, subject to such modifications as experience may dictate, is simple and unpretending, and may be put thus.

"The C.A.S. possesses a unique library, and various objects of interest to Spiritualists; some of them, indeed, historically valuable, and such as should be preserved as heir-looms for the benefit of Spiritualists in the future. It was proposed at the Conference that, if possible, these should be kept intact; that they should become the property of the new Society; and that they should be acquired by it without cost.

"A room large enough to contain this library, to serve as a reading-room, and as a place for occasional meetings, is easily procurable at a small outlay. The necessary expense of rental need not exceed £50 per annum. Under the same roof it is proposed, as a matter of convenience, by the Editor of 'LIGHT' and manager of the Psychological Press Association, to place the publishing office of that journal and Association.

"It will be seen that an efficient system of organisation will thus be secured. Not only this, but Spiritualists as such will have taken a fitting stand in vindication of their faith at a time when such a step is incumbent upon them. It is, in the opinion of those who are acting in this matter, an imperative duty to keep together a nucleus of those Spiritualists who have so long been associated, and to do by united effort what individual energy is powerless to accomplish for the support of the literature of Spiritualism, as well as for the introduction of it in likely quarters.

"Most incipient organisations have been crushed by the necessity for making appeals for money to those who are disposed to interest themselves in their work, but who resent this continual begging, as they consider it. We do not propose to countenance any system of appeals for money. Money will, of course, be needed; and it will be forthcoming. The small subscriptions of our members will furnish us with an income within which our operations will be rigidly confined. As our work is tested, and found to be good, we have no doubt that our income will grow, and with it our opportunity for usefulness. But in no case shall we transgress the bounds of our income.

"The really important thing is that Spiritualists, many veterans among whom have one by one withdrawn into isolated seclusion, to the great detriment of the cause which they all still uphold by their belief, should make some sacrifice, if need be, in order to unite and take counsel together in times of no little difficulty, and to maintain, among other organisations of those who concern themselves with spiritual things, one which distinctively represents, as none now does, their own special beliefs and convictions.

"It may be well to state explicitly that no profession of faith in any set terms is sought from those who may desire to co-operate with us. We have room for all who realise the importance, in a materialistic age, of expressing a belief that there is something behind matter, and that death does not end all.

"I earnestly trust that old and tried friends of Spiritualism, whose faith is no less assured than my own, and who have done such good service in the past, will feel that there is still work for them which they cannot neglect without injuring what they would desire by every means in their power to support and sustain.

"The Society will be in working order by the opening of the New Year. It is proposed to engage rooms at a rental of not more than £50, in the immediate neighbourhood of Charing Cross; to open a reading-room, where the various Spiritualist papers can be read; to make the library generally available to members; to hold periodical social meetings; and to organise a Sunday service, if found desirable. The subscription of Members is fixed at a minimum rate of a guinea.

"I trust you will give us the countenance of your support, and that you will enrol yourself and members of your family as subscribers. Kindly address your reply as soon as convenient to "M.A. (Oxon.)," care of John S. Farmer, Esq., 38, Great Russell-street, W.C.

"Signed on behalf of the Committee,

THE CENTRAL ASSOCIATION OF SPIRITUALISTS.

The C.A.S. is in process of being dissolved, and will be succeeded by a society based on a scheme suggested by M.A. ("Oxon.") for carrying on effectual work under improved conditions and in other premises. In reference to the C.A.S. we have received a communication from the committee appointed to wind up its affairs, asking us to state that, chiefly through a large number of members having failed to pay their subscriptions, the funds at the disposal of the Council shew a deficiency of about £150. A circular has been sent out to the members impressing upon each one of them the necessity and duty of contributing his fair proportion towards the meeting of this deficit. Some have readily responded to this request, and the committee desire to urge upon those who have not yet done so, the importance of forwarding their contributions without delay. The Council of the C.A.S. are anxious to save their large and unique library and other valuable effects from dispersion and to hand them over to the new Society to be preserved for the future use of Spiritualists, but they will not be able to do this unless their efforts in this direction are generously assisted. We cordially second this appeal, as it would be positively disgraceful, and even cruel, to leave the members of the Council of the C.A.S.—several of whom have for many years given freely of their time and money for the benefit of the cause—to bear the serious burden of liabilities which have been brought about by circumstances over which they could have no possible control.

SPIRITUALISM AND RUSSIAN MEN OF SCIENCE.

Translated from the November number of Psychische Studien:—

"At the meeting of Russian men of science, held at Odessa in August, 1883, Alexander Butlerow, Professor of Chemistry at St. Petersburg, delivered an address on 'The necessity of an investigation of mediumistic phenomena.' More than 500 persons were present. The address has already appeared in the Russian journal Rebus, and will also be published in the Report of the Assembly. With the exception of Professor Barrett's paper read before the British Association at Glasgow in 1876, this is the first time that an address of this nature has been presented to a formal gathering of scientific men."

ERRATA.—In last number of "LIGHT," p. 500 second column, fifth line, insert the words, "in proportion," before "to individually inclined capacity."

THE PSYCHOLOGICAL PRESS ASSOCIATION.—We are asked to give publicity to the following:—Will you allow me, in the columns of "LIGHT," to correct a misapprehension which, from some cause or another, has obtained currency as regards the aim and purpose of this Association. Started for the purpose of publishing the late Psychological Review, it gradually outgrew these limits, is now the recognised publishing agent of standard works on Spiritualism, amongst others those of "M.A. (Oxon.)" Mrs. Howitt Watts Miss F. J. Theobald, and Mr. J. S. Farmer; and is, at the same time, a channel for the supply of the general literature of the subject. In these circumstances it was decided that if successful from a business point of view, all profits should be devoted to the dissemination of spiritual literature. Already, during the current year, a large sum has been devoted to this purpose by free grants of books and pamphlets. A free grant (upwards of fifty volumes) was made to the C.A.S., and an almost similar parcel to the Metropolitan Spiritual Lyceum. Gifts to the value of £1 have also been made to several smaller libraries besides the almost broadcast distribution to applicants of the cheap editions of "The New Basis of Belief," "Psychography," and "How to Investigate Spiritualism." The accounts will be duly audited each year, and can be inspected by anyone who desires to do so. It is managed by unpaid labour, and, in fact, no individual benefits pecuniarily from its operations. I am sorry to trespass upon your space, but it appeared necessary to state these facts.—The Manager of the P.P.A.

INTERESTING MANIFESTATIONS.

OUR CHILD IN HEAVEN.

By S. C. HALL.

I wish to relate another manifestation concerning my intercourse with my beloved wife: she being in Heaven, and I on earth.

In 1831, it pleased God to give us a daughter: the only living child we ever had. I had a strong hereditary desire that the mother should be the nurse of her child. My mother nursed twelve children; never having employed an hireling. I hold that the nurse transmits to the babe she suckles much of her own nature, be it for evil or for good: thereafter, it is more likely to be the one than the other. In this special case, the mother after the birth was utterly unable to discharge that natural duty—the highest and holiest a woman owes to her offspring. She lay on her bed—utterly prostrate—for two weary days. I was sustained—and betrayed—by Hope. At length came the warning of the doctor; it should have been given earlier. I always blamed him for a loss that was, as the result proved, irreparable. I sallied forth, brought back a healthy young mother, and placed the babe in her arms: but it was too late.

Next day it died, literally of inanition: for it was a strong, healthy babe—who ought to have lived, and would have lived if either the monthly nurse or the doctor had done what both ought to have done—warned me of the danger I encountered in my urgent desire that the mother should be the foster-mother as well as the mother of the new-born babe.

Though more than fifty years ago, it has ever since been a malheur for me that this child did not live. She would probably have given me grandchildren—possibly great grandchildren—to cheer and gladden my heart, mind, and soul as I near the bottom of the hill of life; to be my playmates—and my "cares" for here and hereafter. I dearly love children; few things rejoice me more than a romp with them. As it is, I have no thoughtful love from any of my blood. My beloved wife knows that: and so has brought that child to visit me. That is the purport of my present communication to the editor of "LIGHT."

Let me first give you a key to my communication by quoting some lines from my honoured friend, the poet Longfellow:—

"She is not dead,—the child of our affection,—
But gone into that school
Where she no longer needs our poor protection,
And Christ Himself doth rule.

"In that great cloister's stillness and seclusion,
By guardian angels led,
Safe from temptation, safe from sin's pollution,
She lives, whom we call dead.

"Not as a child shall we again behold her;
For when with raptures wild
In our embraces we again enfold her,
She will not be a child;

"But a fair maiden, in her Father's mansion,
Clothed with celestial grace;
And beautiful with all the soul's expansion
Shall we behold her face."

My friend Tom Hood wrote of children:—

"A blessing on their merry hearts,
Such readers I would choose:
Because they seldom criticise,
And never write reviews."

And—longo intervallo—I will quote four lines of my own:—

"God bless you children, bless your simple ways;
God free your lives from earthly soil and dross:
God keep you pure as now, to length of days:
God give the crown, yet teach to bear the cross."

Well, after this somewhat long introduction, I desire to say that this child—this "fair maiden" is frequently brought to me by her mother; and that she has twice written to me letters. They purport to be in her handwriting; certainly they are not in the handwriting of Mrs. Jencken: they were written at mid-day, the paper and a pencil being laid on the ground, under the table, at my feet. I copy those letters here. The first is dated November 28th, 1882.

"My dear father,—My mother wants me to tell you that you have quite forgotten to ask for me. I am always with my mother, and we love each other dearly.—MARIE."

The second was on the 14th August, 1883.

"My dear father,—I am here with my mother. Softly we both place our hands on your head, and bless you. I love you dearly."

This was accompanied by a message from my wife—also in direct writing—

"Dearest Carter,—I told my darling she could write to you—she wished to. We will be very near you to-night.—Your own wife, MARIE."

The name of our daughter was Maria Louisa. (In a parenthesis I may say Mrs. Jencken had not the remotest idea that we ever had a child.)

I proceed to sustain this evidence by quoting passages from several messages delivered to me, by her mother: in nearly all cases direct writing.

"I stop to catch the sweet voice of our child in the heavenly gardens, and to imprint on your lips the kiss of immortal love."

"My own beloved, the star of hope is bright. Our happy child is here; we are companions; we roam the golden fields together."

"My arm shall fold you like a child. I will fold you in my arms, Carter, and our darling child will rest on one side and I on the other."

"Your daughter is lovely in her beauty of youth and wealth of sunny hair. She is the pride of her mother, and the pet of Thomas Moore" (in a message from William Howitt).

"I stood in the midst of foliage and flowers, listening to the voices of many angels. The twilight was just coming on, when I heard a voice calling 'mother'—so sweet it sounded in my ears. I turned, and saw our child standing by my side so beautiful; and then, oh then, I did for one brief moment wish that you were where you could see us; it was a momentary wish, but nevertheless I felt that strong desire for you to see us. You can picture us in our happy home."

"Do you hear our child whispering in your ear, 'Angels are guarding your pillow while you sleep'? She is the angel."

"When we meet again, I am going to try to give a sketch of our child, and I think I shall be able to come visibly to you, here in this room."

"My dearest Carter,—Our child is a young lady. She is very like me when I was seventeen. She is a great blessing to me, and a link between us."

"Often I see our beautiful child leaning out of the flowery-veined window to welcome some new-born spirit to the house of heavenly rest."

"You cannot realise that our daughter is a young maiden—a lovely maiden with eyes of heavenly blue and hair of chestnut brown. Oh, how happy I am to have her for my companion. She met me on the threshold as I was taking my flight from earth."

"Our little girl loves you, kisses you, blesses you, and when I have duties to attend to here, I send her to you with your blessing. She makes my life happy here."

"It is well that our child was born, if only to breathe a few hours on earth. The spirit took its beautiful form here in the home prepared for me by the loved ones who had left earth before I came. I love this child, our child, the link between our two souls. You will know her when you see her. She has blue eyes, and hair a little lighter than my own."

Surely and certainly, it is my daughter who wrote to me, who kisses my brow, and who, I have no doubt, comforts and helps me, who companions her mother in the realms of Light and of a surety will be my dear, loving companion, when I am in my home removed from earth life.

I make this record, not only as a confirmation of another of the cheering and comforting consolations to be derived from Spiritualism rightly understood and interpreted, but in the hope that I may thus console parents whose children have been taken from them; in infancy, childhood, or youth.

I quote from Southey—from memory:—

"O, when a mother meets on high
The babe she lost in infancy,
Hath she not then for all her tears,
Her days of woe, her sleepless nights,
An overpowering of delights?"

I leave to mothers the happy task of enlarging upon this subject: there is no one of them who cannot do it better than I can do it—to her own mind, heart and soul.

My friend Thomas Moore thus writes:—

"Weep not for her whom the veil of the tomb—
In life's happy morning hath hid from our eyes
Ere sin threw a blight on the spirit's young bloom
And earth had profaned what was meant for the skies."

It will be hard to conceive a greater amount of happiness than will be derived by a mother, from the conviction that her child "removed" has become one of her guardian angels appointed by the Master to aid, comfort, and console her through the dark valley, and to lead her to the "great white throne" where she may kneel in adoration and hear the words "Good and faithful servant enter thou!"

I presume to trespass on your courtesy by asking you to make room for this poem. I versified it from an anecdote related to me by my esteemed friend Anna Mary Watts, the daughter of my honoured and valued friends William and Mary Howitt.

"A childless widow, seemingly forsaken,
Gave words to wrath—rebellious, fierce, and wild:
Wrath that the gift The Giver gave was taken:
And would not pardon God who took her child."

She had a waking-vision: saw a band
Of happy children: there she knew her boy:
Each held a lighted lamp in his young hand:
And, as they passed, each sang a hymn of joy.

All but one mournful child: his solemn tread,
And face, were gloom: his lamp—it had no light:
When, sobbing through her tears, the mother said,
'How comes it, dear, your lamp is dark as night?'

'Mother!' he said, 'you, mother, make me sad,
Your tears put out my lamp: and stay my voice:
I must be mournful when I would be glad,
In silent sorrow, where I should rejoice.'

Up rose the mother from her knees, and smiled;
Her sobs were stilled: of tears remained none:
As bending low her head towards her child,
She clasped her hands and said, 'His WILL BE DONE!'

Out burst the lamp, with a wide-spreading light!
Out burst, from all that group, a joyful hymn!
It changed to perfect day the dismal night,
When heard and echoed by the Seraphim."

I could, as you very well know, sustain the statements made in this letter by statements at least as conclusive as mine, and I hope I may add, as convincing. It is rarely that a rightly conducted and constructed "sitting" takes place without similar evidence; that some spirit does not enter the circle, giving his or her name—a name recognised by some one present, but utterly unknown to any other person present. I have recorded some cases in point; there is no experienced Spiritualist who could not largely supplement them.

Of the joy, happiness, stimulus to work for the cause of God, which is always the cause of man, encouragement to uprightness and virtue, to walk in the right way, and to do His will—the high, and holy, and glorious rewards—I need say nothing.

Those who cannot or will not believe, are to be pitied: those who can and do—who accept the guidance of a new light added to and aiding that of Scripture—are as surely to be envied.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[It is preferable that correspondents should append their names and addresses to communications. In any case, how ever, these must be supplied to the Editor as a guarantee of good faith.]

"Organisation of Spiritualism." To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—In order to form a powerful international organisation of Spiritualists, such as "M.A. (Oxon.)" contemplates, the axioms for universal acceptance must necessarily be as broad, as simple, and as few in number as possible. It would be desirable that a committee should be formed for the purpose of framing such axioms, and communicating them to the Spiritualistic Societies of the United Kingdom and of other nations. With such an object in view, I venture to suggest the following scheme:—

1. That a small committee of London Spiritualists should be selected, consisting of not more than twelve members.
2. That this committee should draw up a few generally acceptable axioms and send them to the various home and foreign Societies of Spiritualists, with a request that these axioms should be communicated to the members of the said societies, with a view to the forming of a great world-union of Spiritualists.

3. That the various societies communicated with should, after due discussion, return the axioms to the committee with such observations and suggestions as may naturally be made by the members.

4. That the committee, after duly considering the various answers received, should frame a final code of axioms to be submitted to the said societies for the final acceptance and signature of their members.

5. When the work of union has been achieved, as please God it will be, let it be left to the discretion and judgment of the Spiritualists of each individual country to make what use they please of the facts of the Union.

In England, the present position of Spiritualism is both deplorable and hopeful. The time seems to have come for a firm and honest declaration of our belief, in order that our countrymen may learn the full extent of the truths of Spiritualism and its absolute independence of every other belief. At this moment many of the great minds of the nation are unconsciously Spiritualists in thought, word, and deed. Many of our magazines and periodicals are seriously discussing the phenomena of Spiritualism, and by so doing are paving the way towards its active propagation. Moreover, the masses of the lower classes, disgusted with the selfishness of the creeds of the various Churches, are trying to do without God altogether; and indeed, the widespread prevalence of disbelief in the very existence of the Deity should be an incentive to Spiritualists to make the truths of their own belief more generally known. We ought also to try and dissipate the mistaken conception of mankind, that the individual is not to be allowed to decide for himself in the matter of his religious belief. Nor should we omit to show that the writers of the Established Church have been busy in appropriating our literature to get materials to underprop their own doctrines, lest the truths of Spiritualism fall to the ground with the doctrines, and thereby add difficulties to the future task of propagation.

To conclude, we must betlink ourselves that the dogmas of the Churches are incapable of a long life, and must regard it as a sacred duty to make our fellow men sharers in the glorious truths that have been vouchsafed to us, and, in short, must endeavour "to justify the ways of God to men."—Respectfully yours,

B. A. (OXON.)

[It will be seen on reference to p. 514 that an organisation, framed on broad and liberal principles, has already been formed. We understand that influential Spiritualists, who for years have abstained from public action, and others who never yet joined any Society, have already joined the London Spiritualist Alliance.—ED.]

Mormonism. To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—There are some rose-coloured renderings of Polygamous Mormonism in yours for November 10. One may be a Mormon as a Monogamist, or a Polygamist. I have known intimately both kinds of Mormons. One of the most intelligent Mormon ladies I know, said to me, "I have no fear for the future of Mormonism as regards polygamy. The children have seen their mothers suffer too much to perpetuate this terrible misery."

It may be human selfishness for a man or woman to desire another self, a counterpart, a unity of two, wherein no third or thirtieth person can interfere. But the desire with many is as strong as the wish for life. The best, the most intelligent Mormon women I have known, have had this desire, and have hated the plurality of wives inexpressibly. When I mentioned that women had written in favour of polygamy as practised by Mormons, I have been told that the husband wrote "the confession of faith," and that his wife signed it, as many documents have been signed by women that had a masculine origin. There may be many outward uses for plurality of wives, and they may make interested servants in the co-partnership established for them. One woman may escape the sensuality of a bad man, if he is infinitesimally divided, but the fact still remains that women want love and fidelity, and that the hunger of the heart they suffer, if this instinct is not broken down, is not to be described, and cannot be appreciated by men who get wives, as they get cattle, to breed and do the work of their master.

It is said that "in Heaven they neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels." The Swedenborgian finds in this text proof of the eternal duality of souls and that marriage is but the normal state of the angels.

It is certain that monogamy on earth is far from being angelic life, and I have the testimony of the wives of much married Mormon men that polygamy is still further removed from angel life, unless it be that kind of angels who kept not their first estate, and so have got a bad name. If it could do any good to anybody to whitewash polygamy—it might be worth while. Certain am I, that even polygamous Mormons are not as bad as they are painted. That there is no social evil in Utah we can well believe, as there are no men to demand that form of licence, having established a more satisfactory kind in their homes.

It is 35 years since Brigham Young went to Utah. Mormonism has made small gain in that time, and Polygamous Mormonism still less. The world moves, but Mormonism does not, or so it seems to an

A Litany of Remembrance.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

DEAR SIR,—I send you for insertion a "Litany of Remembrance" from a Manual of Devotion for Catholic Spiritualists, which I think will be appreciated by your readers.—Yours,

A. C. P.

For Commemorations, &c.

The Twelve A. U. M. Remembrances.

1.—To everyone who feedeth the hungry or giveth drink to the thirsty, of all creatures,

Blessing and Remembrance.

2.—To everyone who helpeth or protecteth the weak and the oppressed,

Blessing and Remembrance.

3.—To everyone who planteth a tree for use or beauty in his own ground, or after appointed order in public grounds,

Blessing and Remembrance.

4.—To everyone who giveth water to a tree or a plant that needeth,

Blessing and Remembrance.

5.—To everyone who raiseth up fruit and grain for the service of all,

Blessing and Remembrance.

6.—To everyone who putteth up a stone which is fallen, or repaireth that which is broken,

Blessing and Remembrance.

7.—To everyone who maketh a bridge, or a road, or a water-course, where there is need,

Blessing and Remembrance.

8.—To everyone who putteth a light in a dark place to guide the steps of the wanderer,

Blessing and Remembrance.

9.—To everyone who kindleth a fire where there is need to give heat to them that are cold,

Blessing and Remembrance.

10.—To everyone who redeemeth the land that is waste and turneth the desert place into a fruitful garden,

Blessing and Remembrance.

11.—To everyone who worketh with the hands the thing which is useful or beautiful,

Blessing and Remembrance.

12.—To everyone who discovereth and maketh known that which is good, beautiful, or true, for the service of humanity,

A Plea on Behalf of Starving Children at the East End of London.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I thank you sincerely for the publicity accorded through your columns to my labour of love; and whilst acknowledging the many kind letters enclosing subscriptions to my book-fund for this good purpose, would earnestly request all who have not as yet responded to the circular to do so without delay, that I may begin to organise according to the means and supply.

This is my first great benevolent project, owing its origin to my last summer's visit to Styria, and the encouragement of my kind friends the Baron and Baroness Von Vay. So I do trust it may succeed.

Many lady friends are working with me, but I should be glad to hear from more, as well as to receive subscriptions and donations from all who have hearts to feel for these poor little waifs and strays of humanity.

Extraordinary Occurrences. To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—It is worthy of note that whilst two of the leading journals after detailing for some days these occurrences as taking place before many witnesses, finally, no doubt to their relief, proclaimed triumphantly the whole affair to be a farce, as evidenced by the alleged confession of the girl Emma Davies, the Daily Chronicle, on the other hand, devoted a column of its space, the same day, to the statement of the mother, bearing out the truth of the facts entire. There is also no mention made of any confession, forced or otherwise. Simply that the girl had been removed to a distance. Can any of your readers enlighten us further? It is doubtful whether the girl can yet be in a normal condition.—Faithfully yours,

CHARLES DELOLME.

Sleep in the Unseen World. To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—There is a strange yet almost universal opinion that there can be no such thing as sleep in the state after death. You find it expressed in many hymns together with the most unpleasant idea of absolute light, unvaried by cloud or shadow. Thus the author of that beautiful and memorable book, "Religio Medici," quotes these lines:—

"O come that time when I shall never Sleep again, but wake for ever."

On which my comment would be, God forbid that such a time should ever arrive! I can hardly conceive a more bitter or withering curse than would be implied in the words, "May you never sleep again!" I would rather take the words, "He giveth His beloved sleep" as applying to all states of being, just as the opposite assertion would be to me the deepest of maledictions.

In "Hymns Ancient and Modern," that most popular of hymn-books, we read:—

"There no cloud nor passing vapour
Dims the brightness of the air,
Endless noon-day, glorious noon-day
From the Sun of suns is there;
There, no night brings rest from labour,
For unknown are toil and care."

Such is the general idea in the hymns of all denominations. But we do not find it in Milton—for he gives a clouded moon even to Paradise. He was too artistic for such nonsense, as well as too cognisant of human needs in all states of existence. Thus he sings:—

"Now, when ambrosial night with clouds exhaled
From that high Mount of God, whence light and shade
Spring both, the face of brightest heaven had changed
To grateful twilight (for night comes not there
In darker veil), and rosy dews disposed
All but the unsleeping eyes of God to rest."
There is not black night, but ambrosial night—grateful vicissitude—as he had said just above.

"Evening now approached,
For we have also our evening and our morn,
We ours for change delectable, not need."

If they did not need the change for physical reasons, yet they would do so for moral and intellectual. But how do we know that sleep and night with its lighter veil are not required even by the spiritual body—for that body is still matter in its finest form? Yet some such idea as this seems at the bottom of this uncomfortable persuasion that there can be no such thing as sleep in the upper worlds. They argue—a body that requires restoration in sleep must be a corruptible body, which is excluded by the hypothesis. But we know too little of the celestial body to argue with any confidence in this manner. Let us meanwhile embrace the more cheering, pleasant, and beautiful belief with steadfast assurance that it will also prove the truest.

And this is charmingly brought out by Miss Phelps in her remarkable work, "Beyond the Gates," and which has been commended to the perusal of all your readers by "M.A. (Oxon.)." The young débutante in the new life had been denied her first request and strong desire to be allowed to re-visit her mother whom she had left behind her on the earth. This was a great trial and disappointment. We shall see how it was relieved.

"I had met, and by His loving mercy had mastered my first trial in the eternal life—more wearied than I had thought by the effort, I was glad to sink down under the trees in a nook, and yield to the drowsiness which stole upon me after the great excitement of the day. It was not yet dark, but I was indeed tired. A singular subsidence, not like our twilight, but yet reminding one of it, had fallen upon the vivid colour of the air. No one was passing—and I was left alone. The grass was softer than eider of the lower world; and lighter than snow-flakes the leaves that fell from low-hanging boughs about me. Distantly I heard moving water; and more near sleepy birds. More distant yet, I caught, and lost, and caught again, fragments of orchestral music. I felt infinite security. I had the blessedness of weariness which knew it could not miss of sleep. Dreams stole upon me with motion and touch so exquisite that I thought, sleep itself is a new joy; what we had below was only a hint of the real thing; as I sank into deeper and deeper rest."

I have italicised the more special points. She was at last permitted to go on her errand of love, but was "advised to rest awhile before taking the journey, and to seek this rest at once." How natural and exquisite is all this! better far, I think, than the no-sleep idea, and the unclouded blaze of light.

Allow me also to call attention to chapter xii. of the same work, relating a vision of the "Symphony of Colours," with all their chords, harmonies and scales—a better idea than the "endless noon-day—blazing noon-day" of pure white unshaded light. It makes one's heart ache to think of it.

Astrology. To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I have again to thank "C.C.M." for his further communication on this subject, and am glad to know that he thinks more of it than what I inferred from his previous letter. An inquiry de novo such as his, with his usual painstaking research, will form a valuable contribution to a subject at present so very moot.

With respect to your correspondent "Z." who has favoured me with his personal opinion unasked, I am afraid his zeal has outrun his discretion, or else, slightly altering the text, "much learning hath made him rude." I prefer to think the former, and would remind him that "although 'tis well to have a giant's strength, 'tis not always well to use it."

A Mistake Corrected. To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I observe that in alluding to the threatened interdict by Messrs. Cassell and Co., in 1876, of the publication of "Hafed," Colonel Olcott makes a mistake. It was not plagiarism of literary matter Messrs. Cassell complained of, but the copying of certain engravings in the direct pictures, furnished by the spirit artists for the illustration of the volume. An interesting correspondence on the subject will be found in the Spiritualist, dating from February 18th to March 31st, 1876.—I am, yours, &c.

A REMARKABLE CURE OF EPILEPSY.

We very gladly give publicity to the following strong testimony to the healing powers possessed by Mr. F. Omerin. This case is by no means a solitary one, Mr. Omerin being in possession of many similar documents.

DEAR MR. OMERIN,—For the benefit of similarly afflicted ones, I beg that you will make public the following case.

Eight years ago my daughter, aged twelve, rescued a companion from drowning. The shock so affected her system, that she became subject to epileptic fits. During the following six years she was attended by several medical men, including an eminent Edinburgh professor, without receiving any benefit: in fact, they all declared her case was hopeless.

Her father's sudden death, two years ago, laid her completely prostrate; and circumstances compelling me to remove to London, I at once sought advice here with the same result: "Incurable."

I had given up all hope when, providentially for me, I met with a lady friend who had received benefit from your treatment. At her request, you kindly undertook to cure my poor afflicted daughter, and I am proud and thankful to say that it has been effected. She is now twenty years of age, a picture of health, strong in mind and body, a perfect astonishment to all who formerly knew her; in short, they consider it quite a miracle. Her brothers and sisters desire to offer you their very best thanks, and I, her mother, everlasting, heartfelt gratitude.—I am, dear Mr. Omerin, yours very sincerely,

CHARLOTTE DOWNIE WHITE.

In "LIGHT," p. 495, Vol. III., first column, line 29 from bottom, for "from the right," read "from the Right."

With the current number (September 1st.) Light for All is suspended. It has been a bright cheery little visitor, and has been always welcome.

A few friends of Mr. Henry Burton are desirous of presenting a testimonial to that gentleman, previous to his departure for Queensland, in acknowledgment of his work in the Spiritual movement in the North of England. A farewell tea is to be held in the hall at Weir's Court, Newcastle (kindly granted by the committee), on Tuesday, November 27th, when the testimonial will be presented. Amongst the visitors who have promised to be present are Mr. Morse, of London; Mr. Robertson, of Glasgow; Mr. Lambelle, of Shields; Mr. Jos. Skissey, of Newcastle; and deputations from various Spiritual Societies in the district. The proceedings will be interspersed with music. Mr. J. J. Morse will give a trance address on "Ghosts: and what they teach us," on the preceding evening.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M.A. (Oxon.)"

I took occasion, last week, to note some very suggestive remarks of Hudson Tuttle's on the subject of "Trance-mediumship." The current number of the Harbinger of Light, just received from Melbourne, contains a letter from him on the general subject of mediumship. The Spiritualists of Australia are craving, it seems, for some good and well-known medium, through whom they may be pretty sure of "seeing something." Mr. Tuttle advises them "not to wait for the coming of some remarkable personages. They may not come, and should they, the chances are you will be disappointed." He has "watched with great interest the effects of public mediumship, and has contrasted it with that of home growth." "I am," he says, "in favour of the latter. While public mediumship has its place, and has accomplished a great work, I think the home circle is the more appropriate place for satisfactory investigation." It must be so in the nature of things. The conditions of mediumship are most delicate. Every form of psychic influence present in the circle is filtered through the medium; and it is not to be expected that the full delicacy of sensitiveness should be preserved after prolonged association with the mixed influences that pervade a public circle. The wonder is, not that the fine edge of sensitiveness is dulled, but rather that it does not become utterly unserviceable.

Hudson Tuttle is perhaps a little over-sanguine in saying that "it would be difficult to select six or eight persons, without securing at least one whose sensitiveness would develop into noteworthy mediumship." I should have put the proportion at a much lower rate. But there can be no doubt in the mind of an experienced investigator that for the observation of what are called (rather disparagingly, perhaps, to those other phenomena on which, as a secure foundation, the fabric of Spiritualism is based)—for the observation of the higher phenomena the home circle is the place. The conditions are more favourable for the delicate little bits of evidence of the presence of those whom we have known, and whose ways we are familiar with, than the publicity of the mixed circle. And it is these little undesignated touches which come home to the observer with a conviction that no manifestation of power, however awe-inspiring, could rival. Not though the house were shaken, as of old, with a power incalculable and full of terror, is the inquirer so impressed as by the sound in his ear of that old familiar name known only to himself and to some who have gone before. A searching criticism may detect in the evidence so given a flaw that spoils its full completeness; but, so long as the human heart is what it is, those voices from a buried past will come home with a force and completeness that is all their own. And, though I am far from denying that these bits of evidence are got in public, it is in the privacy of the home circle that they find their appropriate place.

But this is, perhaps, not exactly all that our Australian friends want. There are in the world a number of sceptical folk whom their friends want to convert. The desire, if natural, is mistaken; but it exists. The mental attitude of such is not favourable to the delicate evidence I have been discussing. A powerful physical medium, through whose psychical powers some demonstration of a force and intelligence can be given, is more to the point. They do not want, they will not take the pains to meet and wait for, what is required. So it comes to pass that a fully developed medium, who can usually be depended on to get such evidence, is sought for. This, too, is what a Society wants: though for my own part I think that such a Society as our own for Psychical Research might well experiment in both directions. It might secure a physical medium and conduct with him such an exhaustive course of experiment as it has already done in thought-transference and mesmerism. And such a course should be long and thorough, or it will fail of its full value. If, alongside of this, a home circle could be formed of those who can give time and can meet regularly, and who are not bent merely on exploding what they have conceived to be a fallacy or a fraud, I should expect results in both directions. But patience and time are needed, and most of us are scarce of both.

The Theosophist contains a long, very acrimonious, and quite uninteresting article on the St. James's Gazette review of "Esoteric Buddhism." The writer of that article says that I "greeted it with open arms"; that it "received a ready hospitality" in "LIGHT"; that I "hold out a threat on behalf of Dr. Rhys Davids of bringing forth 'his own private resources of Buddhism'"; with much more of the same sort of stuff. I should not for a moment think it worth while to make reply to what is mere petulance beyond reach of any argument, but the writer by implication, if not directly, accuses me of "traducing," and generally (for the language is not very precise or coherent) of maligning, Theosophy. I have done nothing of the kind. A slight exercise of memory would, I should have thought, suffice to recall many occasions when I have shewn anxiety to gain a fair recognition and hearing for claims that I did not fully accept. As for my poor note on the clumsy badinage of the St. James's Gazette, it has evidently been taken seriously, with no idea that I was poking fun at the critic and not at the Theosophists. But these are very uninteresting matters, and I notice them only to repel an imputation that I assuredly have not deserved. I cannot, but regret, too, that in re-producing the protest of Theosophists, which was addressed to this journal, the editor should have appended a remark so uncalled for as this: "It remains to be seen whether 'LIGHT' will have the fairness to publish the above protest." Such flings and such language as is contained in the article under notice will be best ignored for the future.

Mr. Lillie's "Popular Life of Buddha" is, in effect, an attack on Dr. Rhys Davids, whom Mr. Lillie rather unkindly describes as "a very hard-working Pali scholar. . . but a confused and untrained thinker." There will be war in Heaven over that very frank utterance. For Dr. Rhys Davids is of the elect, and the mantle of the Saturday Review enshrouds him. Mr. Lillie says that Dr. Rhys Davids says—which is a little second-hand in the way of information:—

1. Buddha preached Atheism.
2. He denied the immortality of the soul.
3. He was a Materialist.

Furthermore he states that Cinghalese Buddhism is the primitive faith; and that about the date of the Christian era a spurious Buddhism arose "which proclaimed a belief in God." Against this somewhat pronounced programme, Mr. Lillie takes up his parable. He demolishes agnostic Buddhism, and makes light of Dr. Rhys Davids as a misguided Comtist. There can be no doubt that Dr. Rhys Davids colours with his own preconceptions what he reads. A man who finds in Buddhism, "Atheism, annihilation, and the non-existence of the soul," has brought with him what he discovers. This, I am aware, is the modern method. The ancients, so we are now taught, did not know their own minds. It is the business of the higher criticism to read into their works that which is lacking in them:—not a soul, for the higher criticism knows nothing of soul:—but that pure and elevating gospel of matter, not uncombined with fog, which is a familiar sign of the present times. According to Mr. Lillie, Dr. Rhys Davids is very successful in supplying fog. Mr. Lillie's book will command deserved attention.

Mr. Hiram E. Felch, who dates from 16, Brattle-square, Boston, U.S.A., records in a recent number of the Banner of Light some instances of materialisation, which are as striking as any that I have met with. The medium was Mrs. Ross, of Providence, R.I., the place was Lake Pleasant, and the date August 27th of this year. The light is declared to have been sufficient for exact observation. The medium sat in a small room separated by a curtain from that in which the circle, one of the members of which was Dr. Slade, was seated. After various figures had appeared, the narrative is thus continued:—

"The curtain was again drawn aside, revealing the form of a woman, and I was gratified to receive a request to approach it, when the spirit appeared to express satisfaction, and at once said, 'Oh! my dear, dear brother, you know me now,' and then repeatedly kissed me. The spirit again spoke, thanking me for acts in the past. It said, 'I have long desired to come; brother, you are—' and here the spirit seemed to lose power, but reaching back, touched the medium, which evidently renewed her strength, and continued—'you are loved by your spirit-friends. Father is here, and we send love to all.' This speech was given word by word, slowly, all the time the spirit having her arms around my neck, while I had my arm around her waist. The eyes of the spirit were bright, and the movements of the features natural. She referred to subjects known only to ourselves, and in every way endeavoured to impress upon me the reality of spirit-return. After assuring me of the love of my spirit-friends she slowly dematerialised, having her arms around my neck, while my arm was around her form—in a moment all was gone, leaving my arms empty. That this spirit was my sister, Sarah C. Dunbar, formerly of Winthrop-street, East Boston, I have no hesitation in asserting. She passed from earth some years ago, but never, before this occasion, had she been able to fully shew herself, having often tried, and I have no doubt but that her spirit left her home in the 'better world' to banish all doubt from my mind, so that I should never again question the immortality of the human soul."

The teaching of the Quietists has been lately revived among us by the publication of some extracts from "The Spiritual Guide" of Molinos,* with a preface by one who perhaps has more sympathy with them than any living man of mark—Mr. J. H. Shorthouse, author of "John Inglesant." Quietism, substantially identical with the doctrine of the great mediæval Mystics, dates back to the latter part of the seventeenth century, when Miguel Molinos proclaimed at Rome his central doctrine, so near akin to the chief doctrine of Buddhism, and was crushed by the Inquisition. His constant theme was the necessity for perfect internal repose, not as in itself the highest good, but as a necessary step to perfection. Therein he differed from the Eastern doctrine. He regarded the soul distracted by the turmoil of the world, concerned chiefly in battling with surrounding dangers and temptations, as incapacitated for real development and growth. In a state of calm alone does the soul become conscious of the spiritual power that directs the universe, and is filled with a holy joy as it enters into communion with them. This state is reached only by absolute abnegation of Self. Not only must the outward life be regulated in accordance with the principles of morality: but the inner and true life must be nurtured by meditation, and regulated by the sacrifice of every selfish wish or aim that could introduce a discordant element or even a disturbing influence into the presence-chamber, where perfect peace should reign. This rare state is the rest after conflict; the result of victory over temptation; the final triumph over obstacles placed designedly in the way by spirit-guides and instructors, lest arrogance, self-confidence, and pride make pure Quietism impossible. Mr. Shorthouse's preface sets forth his belief that Quietism as a doctrine is appropriate to an age which is witnessing an arrogant reign of Intellect, and a decay of Faith. The publication of the book, and its recommendation by a popular writer, is at any rate a sign among many of the quickening of the spiritual life, and of the more definite conception of spiritual things which this generation is also witnessing.

MISS LOTTIE FOWLER.—This well-known medium leaves London for a short provincial tour on Tuesday next, after which she proceeds to America on family business. She goes first to Glasgow for three days, thence to Edinburgh, and then on to Newcastle. Friends in other places can obtain appointments by addressing her. Address up to Monday, the 3rd inst., to 60, Mount-street, Grosvenor-square, W.

MATERIALISM v. SPIRITUALISM.—One striking fact should have some weight with materialists. It is that while thousands of materialists, from the observation of facts, become Spiritualists, no Spiritualist, acquainted with these facts, has ever been converted to Materialism. What a man has seen, heard, and felt, he knows, and argument about its impossibility is useless.—The Spiritual Record.

WAS IT PROVIDENCE?—The following interesting extract is from a letter recently to hand from Mr. Bedford, a Staff-surveyor under the Queensland Government, to whom we had sent a parcel of Wesley's sermons on "Good Angels." Referring to this pamphlet, and the use he was making of it, he says:—"It was indirectly the means of saving my life. I received my mail while in the field at work, and had just finished perusing it, and was pondering over what Wesley said about spirits saving in many cases from sudden death by impressions, and was walking down the surveyed line towards where my men were felling a very large tree, when I was strongly impressed to step on one side. I disobeyed it for a few minutes, when it came so strongly on me again that I could not disregard it, and in stepping on one side the tree fell right where I was standing, grazing my heel as it fell. Another second I should have been crushed to death, and previously neither I nor my men had any idea the tree would fall my way, as it was leaning slightly the contrary direction." This is what would ordinarily be called a special interposition of Providence, but we Spiritualists know that Providence works by deputy, and that the agents in such instances as this are disembodied spirits.—Harbinger of Light.

"WHO ARE OUR SPIRITUAL ENEMIES?"

A PATCHWORK FROM BÖHME.

III.

"We have shewn you already concerning the seven forms of the Centre of the Eternal Nature, where every form is a several well-spring of nature; in like manner out of every form, out of every well-spring, go forth spirits, according to the multiplicity of essences and properties, every one according to its kind." ("Threefold Life," chap. iv., par. 37.)

It is curious how absolutely blind we may be to the freight of a sentence for which we have no prepared ground: it may be read repeatedly and yet lodge no idea in the mind. This is particularly the case when we read writings so loaded with obscurities as Böhme's necessarily are (could the riddle of the universe, if it were explained to us, be solved in simple language?) I suppose I must have passed over these words "Out of every form go forth spirits," at least a dozen times before—only a year ago they suddenly lit up a labyrinth of puzzles for which I had never found a clue. But I had found and held fast the Scriptural sayings that caused these puzzles, and so when the light flashed in, there was proof of its being true light, ready at every point on which it fell. And just this is the advantage of the blind faith so often scornfully spoken of; it fixes words of revealed truth in the mind, and holds them there until intelligence can overtake belief: whereas if only what can be understood is retained, the measure of understanding is too likely to become the test of what we can believe to be true, and then the superstitions of ignorance stultify us more and more.

I read in the Bible of the enemies of the soul, of the powers of darkness, of spiritual wickedness in high places, and without any cavil, asked myself, How can God allow them to be powers? Why are they enemies? How did spiritual wickedness get into high places? and this tempting of the devil, even supposing that myriads of evil spirits form the enemy of mankind, how is it effected when, so far as self-consciousness goes, we are, for the most part, our own tempters? But having fully grasped Böhme's doctrine as to the soul of man being existent in the mutual interaction of the seven Spirits of Eternal Nature, having for the root of its manifested life the three first "tormentive forms" of that nature,—the fourth fire for its first essential life in nature; and the three last forms for the blissful evolution of that life, with a will acting in its fiery life free to allow either form or property of nature to elevate itself above the rest in its own abyss; free to "imagine into" either, to draw with all the magic magnetic strength of the will towards either,—then these few words, "Out of every form go forth spirits," explained to me more than I had ever hoped in this life to understand.

To say that a man has no worse enemy than himself, meaning by such words that he permits and indulges what is evil in himself, is therefore to utter a very foolish, ignorant, and cruelly misleading notion. For what is man? A being who consists as to nature [of his anti-naturing original I do not speak] of these seven forms of Eternal Nature, which extend through all created worlds and cause all manifestations of spiritual life: hence his own abyss of being is in a very mysterious but terrible sense contiguous to that of all others, and limitless in potentiality. What is more awful still, man made in the likeness of God has no equal in the spiritual world in this prerogative—he alone among all creatures is a denizen of what Böhme calls the three principles, i.e., the dark world, the world of light, and the world of ultimated essences; (corrupt and mixed in the nature of our earth, but pure and glorious and truly substantial in the region from which our world of nature derives;) so that spirits native to those three principles all desire the agency of man, for "all would be creaturely;" even, so Böhme tells, "the Deity hath had a longing to see the wonders of the Eternal Nature and of the innumerable essences in substance and in corporeal things." ("Threefold Life," chap. iv., par. 26.) All seek the agency of a being who can represent their dominant desire in ultimates.

In the commonest instincts of human nature this longing to realise internal life by external shews itself; witness the efforts of an angry person to get some one else into a rage; of rough strong men to promote a fight; of greedy or frivolous characters to further the gluttony and vanity which they cannot themselves indulge. Now in the dark world where true substance is impossible to attain, this eagerness for embodied representatives is presumably very strong.

In the seventh form of Eternal Nature, the substantiality, all the other forms find their completion and rest, and this, one may suppose, is one reason for the effort of the spirits in each principle or property to find ultimatum, i.e., embodiment in man.

"The desire of the dark world is after the manifestation, viz., after the outward world, to attract and draw the same essentiality into it, and thereby to satisfy its wrathful hunger." ("Signatura Rerum," chap. ii., par. 35.)

For every fire in the spiritual as well as in the material world needs substance to maintain its strength. Let us pause a moment to think what the will of an angry person is;—anger, that so common ripple on the surface of life's tremendous depths!—in connection with the following passage: "The Spirit of God worketh in love and anger. For it is the spirit of every life; it is in everything like as the things will and property is; for one property receiveth another; what the soul willeth, that willeth also the same into which the soul turneth itself: it is all magical: whatsoever the will of a thing willeth, that it receiveth." ("Fifth of Great Six Points," chap. viii., pars. 48, 49.) Remembering also that "the original nature, first, and radical principle or constituent essence of the soul without the light of God is as mere a devil or infernal dragon as Lucifer himself is." ("An Epistle of J. Böhme's," par. 11.)

Any one meeting the eye of man or woman when wrath bursts into utterance, must have instinctive consciousness of this, little as the oppressive or agitating influences of rage are understood. And not only one dragon in human guise confronts us then,—not one bosom devil animates us when our wrath blazes out: in either case, a multitude of spirits who go forth from the well-spring of nature in the property of wrath, combine to emphasize the provocation and keep up the fire. This is quite as certain as that the least brawl in the street quickly attracts a circle of eagerly sympathising spectators; and, if we but knew what we were about when we allow an angry look or word or gesture to escape us, we should suppress the first movement of indignation as anxiously as we remove gunpowder from risks of accidental ignition.

"We have good and evil in us, into which we frame our willing, the essence thereof become stirring in us, and such a property we draw also from without into us." . . . "If we lead ourselves to the good, then God's Spirit helpeth us, but if we lead ourselves to evil, then God's fierce wrath and anger helpeth us; what we will, of that property we get a leader, and thereunto we lead ourselves. And yet it is not the Deity's will that we perish, but His anger's and our will."—"Fifth of Six Great Points," chap. viii., pars. 52 to 54.)

Mr. H. G. ATKINSON, writing from Boulogne-sur-Mer, says:—"LIGHT" seems to me to be the only good journal on the psychological side of Spiritualism—all that I care for. I find Spiritists here firm believers, quite tired of Spiritism. Spiritism is not Spiritualism, nor religion, nor poesy, nor elevating sentiment.

The Polter-Geist.

Thus were the Commissioners, two nights alone excepted, persistently harassed until they were finally driven out of their lodgings in the King's palace. Skipping the detail of the disturbances of the following ten nights, we give the culmination of the annoyance.

"October 30. So well they had past the night before, that this night they went to bed, confident and careless; until about two o'clock, something knocked at the door as with a smith's great hammer, but with such force as if it had cleft the door; then entered something like a bear, but seemed to swell more big, and walk about the room, and out of one room into the other, treading so heavily, as the floor had not been strong enough to bear it. When it came into the bed-chamber, it dashed against the beds' heads some kind of glass vessel, that broke in sundry pieces, and sometimes would take up those pieces, and hurl them about the room, and into the other room; and when it did not hurl the glass at their heads, it did strike upon the tables, as if many smiths, with their greatest hammers, had been laying on as upon an anvil; sometimes it thumped against the walls as if it would beat a hole through; then upon their heads, such stamping, as if the roof of the house were beating down upon their heads; and having done thus, during the space (as was conjectured) of two hours, it ceased and vanished, but with a more fierce shutting of the doors than at any time before. In the morning they found the pieces of glass about the room, and observed, that it was much differing from that glass brought in three nights before, this being of a much thicker substance, which several persons which came in carried away some pieces of. The Commissioners were in debate of lodging there no more; but all their business was not done, and some of them were so conceited as to believe, and to attribute the rest they enjoyed, the night before this lasts unto the massive bitch; wherefore, they resolved to get more company, and the massive bitch, and try another night.

"October 31. This night, the fires and lights prepared, the ordinary keeper and his bitch, with another man persuaded by him, they all took their beds and fell asleep. But about twelve at night, such rapping was on all sides of them, that it wakened all of them; as the doors did seem to open, the massive bitch fell fearfully a yelling, and presently ran fiercely into the bed to them in the truckle-bed; as the thing came by the table, it struck so fierce a blow on that, as that it made the frame to crack, then took the warming-pan from off the table, and stroke it against the walls with so much force as that it was beat flat together, lid and bottom. Now were they hit as they lay covered over head and ears within the bed-clothes. Captain Careless was taken a sound blow on the head with the shoulder-blade bone of a dead horse, (before they had been but thrown at, when they peeped up, and mist;) Browne had a shrewd blow on the leg with the backbone, and another on the head, and every one of them felt several blows of bones and stones through the bed-clothes, for now these things were thrown as from an angry hand that meant further mischief; the stones flew in at window as shot out of a gun, nor was the bursts less (as from without) than of a cannon, and all the windows broken down. Now as the hurling of the things did cease, and the thing walkt up and down, Captain Cockaine and Hart cried out, In the name of the Father, Son and Holy Ghost, what are you? What would you have? What have we done that you disturb us thus? No voice replied. (as the Captains said, yet some of their servants have said otherwise,) and the noise ceased. Hereupon Captains Hart and Cockaine rose, who lay in the bed-chamber, renewed the fire and lights, and one great candle in a candlestick, they placed in the door, that might be seen by them in both the rooms. No sooner were they got to bed, but the noise arose on all sides more loud and hideous than at any time before, inasmuch as (to use the Captains' own words) it returned and brought seven devils worse than itself; and presently they saw the candle and candlestick in the passage of the door, dashed up to the roof of the room, by a kick of the hinder parts of a horse, and after with the hoof trode out the snuff, and so dashed out the fire in the chimneys. As this was done, there fell, as from the ceiling, upon them in the truckle-beds such quantities of water, as if it had been poured out of buckets, which stunk worse than any earthly stink could make; and as this was in doing, something crept under the high beds, tost them up to the roof of the house, with the Commissioners in them, until the testers of the beds were beaten down upon, and the bedstead-frames broke under them; and here some pause being made, they all, as if with one consent, started up and ran down the stairs until they came into the Council Hall, where two sate up a-brewing, but now were fallen asleep; those they scared much with wakening of them, having been much perplexed before with the strange noise, which commonly was taken by them abroad for thunder, sometimes for rumbling wind. Here the Captains and their company got fire and candle, and everyone carrying something of either, they returned into the Presence-Chamber, where some applied themselves to make the fire, whilst others fell to prayers, and having got some clothes about them, they spent the residue of the night in singing psalms and prayers; during which, no noise was in that room, but most hideously round about, as at some distance.

"It should have been told before, how that when Captain Hart first rose this night, (who lay in the bed-chamber next the fire,) he found their book of valuations cross the embers smothering, which he snatched up and cast upon the table there, which the night before was left upon the table in the presence amongst their other papers; this book was in the morning found a hand-burnt, and had burnt the table where it lay; Browne the clerk said, he would not for a 100 and £100 that it had been burnt a handful further.

"This night it happened that there were six cony stealers, who were come with their nets and ferrets to the cony-burrows by Rosamond's Well; but with the noise this night from the Manner-house, they were so terrified, that like men distracted away they ran, and left their haies all ready pitched, ready up, and the ferrets in the cony-burrows.

"Now the Commissioners, more sensible of their danger, considered more seriously of their safety and agreed to go and confer with Mr. Hoffman, the minister of Wotton, (a man not of the meanest note for life or learning, by some esteemed more high,) to desire his advice, together with his company and prayers.

"But certain it is, that when they came to fetch him to go with them, Mr. Hoffman answered, that he would not lodge there one night for £500, and being asked to pray with them, he held up his hands and said, that he would not meddle upon any terms.

"Mr. Hoffman refusing to undertake the quarrel, the Commissioners caused all things to be removed into the chambers over the gatehouse, where they staid but one night. This is well known, and certain, that the gate-keeper's wife was in so strange an agony in her bed, and in her bed-chamber such noise, (whilst her husband was above with the Commissioners,) that two maids in the next room to her, durst not venture to assist her. But affrighted ran out to call company, and their master, and found the woman (at their coming in) gasping for breath; and the next day said, that she saw and suffered that, which for all the world she would not be hired to again."

Scott himself believes that the Woodstock haunting was "a singular piece of phantasmagoria which was certainly played off upon the Commissioners of the Long Parliament . . . conducted by means of the secret passages and recesses in the ancient labyrinth of Rosamond." He believes that in a tract, also much read at the time, entitled "The Secret History of the Good Devil of Woodstock," the true explanation of the mystery is to be found: that in short, the whole was a clever hoax played off by the author of the said tract, Joseph Collins, called "Funny Joe," who declares that under the name of Giles Sharp he had hired himself as a servant to the Commissioners. This tract Sir Walter, however, tells us that he himself had not been able to discover at the British Museum, although he, through "the kind assistance of the keepers, had recovered the two original pamphlets, which contain a full account of the phenomena at Woodstock in 1649," and which he has given in extenso.

The details of the Woodstock hauntings are in their character so entirely in accord with phenomena repeatedly recorded in well authenticated narratives of Polter-geist disturbances taking place in many lands and in various times, both ancient and modern, that the student of this strange class of phenomena may be permitted to pause before he accepts the proffered explanation of "Funny Joe" as the veritable one, or indeed before he is fully assured of the existence of "Funny Joe" himself.

It may be worth a little trouble to the reader curious in such matters, to compare the above narrative with some of the very strange histories of the Polter-geist disturbances, as collected by Mrs. Crowe in the Night Side of Nature, and by Howitt in the volumes of the Spiritual Magazine.

In the Night Side of Nature, by Mrs. Crowe, chapter xvi. The Polter-geist of the Germans, p. 127, Routledge's sixpenny edition, the most remarkable cases recorded are the so-called Stockwell Ghost, 1772. A mischievous ghost, at Bayswater, a haunting occurring at the time Mrs. Crowe wrote her book something earlier than 1848. A case at the house of a Mr. Chare, in Devonshire, 1810. The case of the celebrated Drummer of Tedworth, (in the seventeenth century). At Keppock, near Glasgow, 1670. At the house of Gilbert Cambell, at Glenluce. A terrible case at King-Croft, in Kirkcudbright, 1695. A place inhabited by an Evangelical Bishop called Schotterbeck, 1650. At Aix-la-Chapelle: case of a house quite uninhabitable on account of fearful disturbances. Extraordinary account quoted from Kerner from narrative communicated by Councillor Hahn, in 1828, of what occurred in the Castle of Slawensick belonging to Prince Hohenlohe in Silesia. Case occurring in a house rented in 1835, by a Captain Molesworth.

For facts given by Howitt in Spiritual Magazine, in vol. v. 1864, see extraordinary narrative translated from the German of expulsion from his paternal house of M. Joller, late member of the Swiss National Council, by a haunting of the Polter-geist character:—these disturbances, of a most persistent and annoying character, occurred at Stans, on the Lake of Lucerne, in 1860-62. Also vol. vi. (1865), contains three articles entitled Throwing of Stones and other Substances, collected from a variety of sources ancient and modern. Also p. 245 Landahls Parting Tokens. ## SPIRITUALISM IN GERMANY.

[Translated from "Psychische Studien" for November.]

"A correspondent from Böhrsdorf, near Wilsdruff, Berlin," says the Leipzig Journal, "writes concerning the continually spreading, and, in regard to Psychology, the thoroughly scandalous Spiritualism. Every Monday almost, Spiritualistic séances are held at this place. The chief persons are a saddler and a smith. How little these people are to be convinced by palpable reasons of the futility of their proceedings, is evident from the following incident. At one of the sittings, a 'spirit' declared himself, through the medium, to be that of a German student who had been upon a journey. He gave an address as that of his mother at Berlin. To this they were to write that he could not return from his vacation tour in Italy, because he had been murdered. Thereupon, the saddler Beuthner sends accordingly to the address given by the 'spirit,' and of course the letter was returned through the post-office, the lady named having no existence."

"The incident, however, got abroad in the village, and messieurs the spiritists have naturally been finely laughed at. Yet instead of giving up their nonsense, they explain 'that it was a mischievous spirit, that had led them astray! Enlightenment of the nineteenth century!' We may inform the enlightened reporter [adds Psychische Studien] that investigators of Spiritualism have long been seeking the solution of similar problems, but not with mere scorn of such serious experiences of the soul-life, whereby many indeed without deeper instruction are deceived."

"Why not also instructive?"—Ed. Psychische Studien.

The editor of Psychische Studien refers in a note to a similar circumstance reported in that magazine, June and July, 1874. An address at Dresden had been given by a supposed spirit through a celebrated American medium, and was found to be false. The editor points out that this experience is paralleled in dreams and somnambulism, and comments on the folly of making it merely the occasion for ridicule and unqualified denial, instead of recognising its psychological interest and significance.

"BEYOND THE SUNRISE."

Toward the close of a windy, wintry afternoon, in New York City, not a great while ago, two middle-aged women—friends they were, mediumistic withal—talked together as they often had before, about Spiritualism. They believed in the existence of the spirit-world, and doubted not that it is the inward, the really living world. In addition to their own spiritual experiences, they were familiar with Spiritualist literature, and were personally acquainted with many of the writers, speakers, mediums, and other prominent actors in the Modern Spiritualist movement. While they talked, and their hearts burned, it occurred to them that it might be a good plan, and yet better in the execution, to have Sunday evening receptions—reunions of friends, especially of those interested in Spiritualism, and that the relations there of personal experiences and of well-authenticated facts, would promote agreeable social intercourse, and develop spiritual and mental improvement. "You and I," said one to the other, "have had too many singular experiences not to know that there is a border-land, a mystic country, where matter ends and spirit begins; or rather, where both meet and mingle. We know that spirits, both in and out of the body, do convey impressions of intelligence and affection under favouring circumstances."

Certainly the plan was feasible: for Alice and Phoebe Cary, under no better circumstances, had often made their pleasant parlours the favourite resort, on Sunday evenings, of many a gifted genius, of poets and literary celebrities. In those gatherings the sisters had at times read their own poems before their emergence the next morning to the public eye through the columns of the Tribune. There Horace Groely had freely conversed on religion, politics, and reforms; and there at times had Charles H. Foster, with his senses delicately attuned to voices and impressions from the spirit-world, awakened wonder and reflection among visitors by his marvellous spirit proofs and "miracles."

The longer the New York ladies discussed their project the more promising it appeared. "We will begin this very evening," said one of them; "my old-fashioned square drawing-room is spacious—it will hold thirty people without being filled. We will invite our friends to come and see us, and hereafter on Sunday evenings, to them then and there we will open the shut doors of our inner lives, and find the entrance to others." With them to plan was to execute. Subsequently on Sunday evenings throughout that winter, came together in that old-fashioned parlour, warmed by a grate full of glowing coals, selected and discreet friends, among them Prof. Angus, Dr. Carolus, Mme. Honor; some there were whose real names are now famous and will live long in history; and there, in the quietude and confidence of innocence, truth and friendship, they interchanged thoughts, anecdotes and personal experiences in respect to earth-life and spirit-life, and the interblending of the two worlds. There, too, at times they were favoured with the conscious presence of invisible friends, spiritual beings, whose communion they desired. Certain of the stories and occurrences in that private New York conference, demonstrating the originators of those Sunday evening meetings have recently published in a handy volume. Though the real names of the parties in many of the narrations are not disclosed, yet the characters are so truthfully drawn, that not unlikely quite many readers will see through their incognito and rightly guess their identities. The authors assert that all the occurrences narrated in their book are strictly true. Some of them, especially the Professor's story of the midnight spiritual manifestation of his bride that was to be, and the mid-day fulfilment of it, after a terrible rail-road accident, which revealed the parties, each in propria persona to the other, are intensely interesting.

Doubtless a perusal of the volume will brighten up more or less clearly, according to the spiritual insight of the reader, the shrouded, silent pathway through which all earth's travellers must enter into spirit spheres. It illustrates the progress made by Bunyan's Pilgrim, as long ago he walked through the wilderness of this world. It discloses the track of the "Celestial Railroad" described by Hawthorne; the "Scenes in Another World" portrayed by George Wood, the "Undiscovered Country" sought for by Howells, and reveals glimpses caught by Miss Phelps through "Gates Ajar," yes, even "Beyond the Gates."

To many thoughtful minds and loving hearts, church-members and free thinkers, old and young, the observations of the two New York travellers, "Beyond the Sunrise," are adapted to afford confirmations not less strong than proof of Holy Writ, of the radiant shores, the beautiful cities, and the homes, bright and fair, which await multitudes of earth's pilgrims in the Summer-Land.—A. E. G., in Banner of Light.

SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH.

The general meeting of this Society was held at 11, Chandos-street, Cavendish-square, on the afternoon of November 22nd. The President, Professor Henry Sidgwick, opened the proceedings with a few remarks, in which he emphasised the importance of extending the area of experiments in Thought-transference, in order to multiply the number of persons of unblemished character which those who deny the genuineness of the phenomena must logically conclude to be "in the trick." Mr. F. W. H. Myers then congratulated the Society on the extension which had actually taken place, and which had shewn the faculties involved in Thought-transference to be much commoner than had been at first supposed; and he described in detail a series of experiments made by himself and Mr. E. Gurney, in conjunction with Mr. Malcolm Guthrie, J.P. of Liverpool, on the communication of tastes. These trials had the advantage that the knowledge of the impression to be communicated was confined to these three gentlemen, and the hypothesis of collusion by a code of signals was thus excluded. The experimenters used a great variety of substances, and in a large majority of cases the substance which one or other of them had in his mouth was correctly named or described by the "subject." Mr. Guthrie followed with an interesting account of the manner in which the experiments with these particular "subjects" had originated; and he exhibited a large number of diagrams which they had been enabled accurately to represent by a transference of the impression of the original from the mind or brain of the experimenter, without spoken word or contact of any sort. Many of these results had been obtained by Mr. Guthrie himself, others by some member of the Investigating Committee of the S.P.R., when experimenting alone with one of the "subjects," information by collusion being thus as effectually precluded as information through the ordinary sensory channels. Professor Balfour Stewart then pointed out how illogical is the rejection of these facts as contradictory of known biological laws, they being clearly only an extension of science, such as has been again and again exemplified in its other branches. Finally Professor Barrett described some trials which shewed the extraordinary degree to which "muscle-reading" could be carried; and also recounted a long series of very careful experiments, strikingly exhibiting the power which a mesmerist can sometimes exercise over a "subject" by silent willing. Other papers were deferred for want of time.

AN EASY EXPERIMENT.

Through the kindness of Dr. Anna Kingsford, I have lately been made acquainted with some essays upon Dream, by Dr. Carl du Prel, a German author of philosophical and scientific repute. These writings appear to me of sufficient psychological value to call for an English translation, which I hope may result from a correspondence in which I am now engaged with the author. But my present object in writing to "LIGHT" is not to give a general account of Dr. du Prel's speculations, but to call attention to a fact which he cites from another author, which should, I think, as well as the hypothesis offered to explain it, be made the subject of an independent investigation by the Society for Psychical Research. As, moreover, the investigation is within the competence of anyone who has access to a sleeping child—I suppose it should be a child—it seems better to make the suggestion publicly than there may be the more experiments. The apprehension—not wholly unfounded—which is prevalent as to the effects of mesmerism has doubtless prevented the accumulation of results in thousands of private families, which would otherwise have contributed to popular acquaintance with that science. But the proposed experiment seems perfectly free from objection, while its success would soon establish a very important psycho-physiological fact, not, indeed, (as I shall shew) wholly new to scientific experience, but which is very far from being already recognised, still less appreciated.

Dr. du Prel quotes the experiment (from Dr. Arnold Wienholt's "Heilkraft des thierischen Magnetismus"), in confirmation of an hypothesis which has an important place in his speculations concerning dream. He believes that the greater part of man's individual being belongs to what, in relation to our psycho-physiological existence, must be called the unconscious. But the "threshold" of consciousness is not a fixed limit; in sleep and in some abnormal states it is pushed back, and by so much as this is the case is our horizon extended, and a larger portion of our total nature included within our realised individuality.

Then, also, we come into transcendental rapproches with the universal nature with which we are veritably one, and we attain also a measure of time whereby a vast experience may be transacted in what corresponds to a moment of physical existence. One consequence especially, and it is that to which I am now calling attention, results from the removal of the threshold. Not only our subjective life, but our sensibility to the finer impressions of external forces is restored—not given—by sleep. With the advance of the threshold during our "waking" life, this sensibility retreats behind it; that is to say, it is temporarily merged in the aptitude for grosser perceptions.

"According to physiological laws, weaker excitations are suppressed for consciousness by stronger ones. But let these coarser impressions of sense be interdicted by sleep, then will the finer susceptibilities of the organism revive. Thus Wienholt proved, by experiments upon his perfectly healthy children, while asleep, the existence of forces of nature which never make their impressions felt during waking life. He made passes over the face and down the neck of his son, fifteen years old, with an iron key, at the distance of half-an-inch, without ever touching him. After a few such passes, the boy began to rub the place, and made uneasy movements. He, Wienholt, made similar experiments upon his younger children, with lead, zinc, gold, and other metals. In far the greater number of cases the children averted the parts of their bodies operated on, or rubbed them, or pulled the clothes over them. But the most remarkable impression resulted from approaching the metal to the ear." Dr. du Prel observes (in conformity with many facts which he elsewhere adduces) that doubtless Dr. Wienholt's children experienced dreams somehow corresponding to the sense-impressions made upon them; a supposition which could be tested by waking the child before the recollection could be lost. But the important fact to verify is the exalted sensibility. That might be accounted for either by supposing with Dr. du Prel a subtle force acting directly on the physical organism from the object perceived; or upon the hypothesis suggested some years ago by Dr. Richardson,* of a "nerve atmosphere," that is to say, extra-organic sensibility.

I said that the fact is not wholly unknown to men of science. In an article by Dr. Arthur Gamgee, F.R.S., in the British Medical Journal, October 12th, 1878, describing some experiments at Paris by Professor Charcot, it is said:—"But the most singular fact observed in connection with the cataleptic condition was the following. If, whilst deeply sleeping and cataleptic, anyone (sic) stealthily approached one of his fingers to within a short distance—about half an inch—of the patient's skin, as for example of the palm or back of the hand, she instantly awakened with a cry of 'Ah!' evincing by its tone evident mental anguish, if not actual physical pain."

I am not aware how the learned gentlemen who were present at Professor Charcot's experiments accounted for this fact, or whether they considered it of sufficient importance to call for further investigations.

TRANSITION OF MRS. CROWELL.

From the last Religio-Philosophical Journal to hand we regret to learn of the departure to the higher life of the wife of Dr. Crowell, of Brooklyn. The transition was not altogether unexpected as will be seen from the following letter written by Dr. Crowell to Colonel Bundy, two days previous to the event:—

"DEAR COLONEL AND MRS. BUNDY.—My dear wife can now remain with us but a very few days at the most and may pass to the better land at any moment. She is unconscious and her life is fast ebbing away.

"Thanks to the assurance that our knowledge of spiritual truths brings us in this hour of trial and sadness, our affliction is deprived of its keenest pang—those arising from doubts of the future. We know she is only going before us and that she very soon will return radiantly happy to assure us that her love has survived the ordeal of death.—Fraternally and sincerely,

"EUGENE CROWELL.

"Brooklyn, Nov. 2nd, 1883."

The Journal remarks:—

"Dr. and Mrs. Crowell have passed a long and happy life together; they have the assurance that in death they will not be parted. While the solemn change of death is not to be lightly regarded, yet it need not be dreaded nor the departure unduly mourned."

It then concludes with the following words from Mr. S.C. Hall's tribute to his wife as contained in his "Retrospect of a Long Life," than which we ourselves can find nothing more suitable to close with. He (Mr. Hall) said:—

"In a word, I know that those who are called 'the dead' do not die; that they are merely removed from the earth-sphere into some other sphere—to one of the 'many mansions' of which our Lord emphatically speaks—the first, but not the only, removal; and that under certain conditions which, at present, we cannot comprehend, much less control, the soul that has left earth can, and does, communicate with the soul that remains on earth.

"I add these lines from a small poem—'Hereafter':

'Change there will be, as flowers from branches burst;
But I shall see thee—as I see thee now;
Yet more resembling what thou wert, when first
I kissed thy smooth cheek and unwrinkled brow:

'As in the glory of thy early prime:
Through all thy earth-life: bright at every stage:
THE SOUL IS NEVER OLD: and knows not Time; GOODNESS IS BEAUTIFUL AT ANY AGE.

'Together still: if one have earlier birth
In Paradise, divided, and yet near:
Though one in Heaven may wait for one on earth:
A guiding, guarding spirit: THERE AS HERE!'

ANOTHER "GONE BEFORE."

A warm and earnest Spiritualist has very recently left earth for Heaven—Colonel Joshua Brayn, of Highfield, in the island of Jersey.

About a year ago, he asked me to write for him a few lines such as his family might print on the "memorial" card that would announce his departure. I did write the lines, of which I append a copy; and his family have printed them on a memorial card they sent me.

IN MEMORIAM.

"When a good man is called from earth,
To have, in Heaven, a second birth,
And hear the loving Master's voice:
Millions of brother-saints rejoice!

The "welcome" words we also hear:
(Earth-friends who pay the tribute tear)
"Good, faithful, servant, enter thou!"

He is not gone who leaves us now:
The good man chants a joyful hymn,
In train-bands of the Seraphim!"

I did not know this good man personally; but I did know his moral, social, and intellectual worth; that he was emphatically good in all the relations of life; his heart "open as day to melting charity," earnestly and devoutly desirous to do as much as he possibly could do, for the glory of God and the Heavenward progress of man.

When I wrote the lines, I had little idea that he would go before me; who was so much his senior in years.

I shall probably receive communications from him while I continue earth-bound; for I held him, and hold his memory, in strong esteem and respect.

Yes; another of my friends has preceded me through the dark valley into that sphere where there will be no sorrow or suffering. The links are falling fast from the chain that binds me to life. I quote from my friend, Tom Hood, "I am so near Death's door, that I can almost hear the creaking of the hinges."

Happy are those who know

"There is no death: what seems so is transition;
This life of mortal breath
Is but a suburb of the life Elysian,
Whose portal we call Death."

I have thought it right to preserve this slight memory of the "good man," Colonel Joshua Brayn, while tendering the "usual condolence" to his (for a time) bereaved family, and myself mourning for the absence of a valued friend, who has passed into higher life from the sphere on which rest

"Shadows, clouds, and darkness."

Happy are they who have a foretaste of Heaven by doing God's work on earth.

SPIRITUALISM &amp; OUR ORTHODOX LEADERS.

By F. J. THEOBALD.

II.

M. Lacroix.

M. Lacroix was—like all true Christian Spiritualists—“reverent in his researches,” having a “great dislike to the spirit-rapping soirées in America and the exhibitions of clairvoyance in England.”

This clear testimony to the great value of Spiritualism, coming from the orthodox camp of the London Missionary Society, is really refreshingly in contrast to the bitter denunciations many of our Christian brethren pronounce against us.

The fruit of this belief in the inter-communion between the two worlds on M. Lacroix was, as his daughter declares, “pre-eminent peace,” and an earnest desire to live unspotted from the world, knowing that thereby he would be “fitted to see God.”

In the March of 1859 M. Lacroix heard, as he said, “a distinct voice from Heaven say to him, ‘Set thine house in order, for thou shalt die, and not live.’” He had been somewhat enfeebled in health for some few months, but was by no means in any precarious condition, so as to have reason to anticipate a speedy removal. But calmly and wisely, he so far heeded the spirit-warning as to obey the injunction without delay. Preparing a most clear and elaborate statement of his own affairs and of all other funds in his hands, he explained the whole to his wife, and shewed her where every book and balance was to be found. Before four months had passed he had gained his spirit home.

The account of these last days on earth is most touching. His joy in the anticipation of his passing on was calm and deep. There was “no doubt,” “no fear,” but “perfect peace,” for “Jesus was always near.” As the end of his earthly sufferings approached, his son-in-law writes:—“For two days he was very silent, and then frequently mentioned that he had seen and conversed with his dear friend, Dr. Morison, who, quite unknown to all in India, had died in London three weeks before.” He also spoke of another dear friend (in the spirit-land), saying that he had “seen him, too, and had had much talk with him.”

M. Lacroix was just sixty years of age when he passed away. Upon a marble tablet raised to his memory are the following words:—

“As a preacher to the heathen he excelled;
As a pastor he was greatly beloved;
As a man of undoubted integrity, wisdom, and benevolence,
He was implicitly trusted;
As a Christian he was universally honoured.”

THE LONDON SPIRITUALIST ALLIANCE.—Our readers will find fresh information respecting this new Society on p. 529.

A TRANCE-MEDIUM AMONGST THE WESLEYANS.—At the conclusion of the usual evening service at the Methodist Free Church, Ironbark, Sandhurst, on Sunday, September 16th, a young man, named Richard Keast, approached the communion table, and falling into a trance saw, and described to the astonished congregation, a vision of Heaven. The form of the vision is in harmony with the doctrines of the church with which in all probability the mind of the sensitive was imbued. From the description of the onlookers, he was evidently in the ecstatic condition; his countenance being transfigured by the psychological impressions. A lengthy account of the matter appears in the Bendigo Independent of the 18th ult., and a writer in the Advertiser of the following day suggests the utilisation of the spiritual influx by the church. It seems that both minister and congregation were deeply impressed with the occurrence, which they look upon as supernatural, and intend to assist the young man to qualify himself for a preacher. A study of some spiritualistic literature relating to trance and clairvoyance would be of considerable service to them, by shewing that the only requisite is favourable conditions to educe the latent powers of the sensitive.—Harbinger of Light.

SPIRIT TEACHINGS.

SECOND SERIES.

This series of Spirit-Teachings, like the former, is made up of selections from a great mass which have been automatically written during a series of years. They are selected on no other principle than that of printing what has been valuable to the person for whom they were originally given, in so far as this can be done without trenching on what is merely of personal and private application. The latter consideration excludes a great mass of what would otherwise be interesting and valuable matter. The phraseology has been preserved, as far as possible, intact, names only being omitted. The series follows directly on the first, from which, indeed, it is separated only by the accident of its publication in another journal, and after some considerable interval of time. The publication is resumed in deference to many repeated requests.

No. XLIV.

[The fondness of spirits for anniversaries led me usually to expect some sort of retrospect at the close of a year. On the last day but one in the year 1876, I had had some conversation about the then condition of Spiritualism, and its relations to what was at that time making a stir—Occultism. Imperator, from the very first time that I had any talk with him about the old magical and occult lore, seemed to know little, and to care less, about it. That which it concerned was not within his sphere of action: he had not meddled with it, and was plainly too much absorbed in his own work to trouble himself about it. He entrusted to others the task of informing me, so far as was necessary, about such matters. At the same time he always impressed on me the necessity of avoiding one-sidedness: of studying the inherent powers of my own spirit, and of learning whatever old students had to teach. He drew what struck me as a careful distinction between the experience of those who violently assaulted the closed gates—who would take the kingdom of Heaven by storm—and who, if successful, wrested from the Dweller on the Threshold so much as they were fit to obtain, which, at best, was little, and that little of questionable value:—and those who, now that the gates are ajar, approach under quite other conditions to be received and welcomed, guided and instructed by those who, under other circumstances, could not be reached at all. Something of the kind is put in this communication, given nearly seven years ago.]

This is a warning that you may well ponder. It is necessary for you to know and act on it; but for the majority they have not yet reached the plane of knowledge when they can take in this truth. Hence it will come to pass that Spiritualism will be known exoterically as communing with devils, or as a curious form of mental or bodily disease, or as hallucination or fraud. From such a source it can never be known as you know it, can never be lovely or desirable among men, but must ever be a strange and tangled story, which will baffle the acutest among you to unravel by his own unaided powers.

There is another side, the esoteric, where far other evidence is had of the beauty of spirit communion where two or three meet in faith and sincerity to receive the word that comes to them. Where such circles meet, where the mind is pure and sincere, where the aspirations are exalted and the plane of thought spiritual, where due preparations are made to purify the atmosphere and provide conditions into which the higher spirits can come, then results are commensurate. Where the tone is one of pure affection, the friends who have gone before can oft return and identify themselves, or like-minded souls can come and speak words of consolation and good cheer. Or they who, like ourselves, are charged to enlighten and elevate the seekers after truth, can come and instruct you in the science which crowns all other knowledge. This is an atmosphere far other than that of which we have spoken. Into it the undeveloped cannot enter, or cannot come without permission; even as we cannot long breathe the emanations that befall the circles where the unprogressed gather together. With due care, such circles might be made the vehicles for much enlightenment. But, alas! for the frailty of man's purpose. The concentrated aspiration which is needed becomes irksome. The world engrosses, business presses; cares and troubles enter in, and the medium becomes worthless for our purpose; or friends soon learn all they can assimilate, and so our work flags. Hence it is that no circle can long endure unless under circumstances rare to find. Development is slow, and many causes hinder.

But so long as these sacred meetings are perpetuated among you, so long will there be an esoteric band, who know that the common notion gained in ordinary circles is not the truth, or at least not all the truth. And so long will the aspect of spirit communion which is most associated with the affections, continue to produce the purest and best proof of the holy nature of its faith. You can see now, we hope, why we have always urged on you the esoteric nature of true Spiritualism; why we have warned you to regard the truth as something too holy to be noised abroad and profaned; why we have withheld you from publicity, while we have encouraged you to defend the out-works of the truth. And you can see too, why, now that the truth is in danger, it becomes your duty to do still more for its defence. You can see, too, why we urged you and our friends to withdraw from open communion until the troublous time was past.

This is the risk, and this the blessing of Spiritualism. You knew them before, but it is well they be stated afresh. Observe that we have as yet said nothing of that which you call Occultism. We have spoken of the better side of Spiritualism as founded on the affections. In proportion as the affections are brought into play in pure and sincere aspiration, the best results are obtained. But there are other qualities of your mind which find no place in what you may describe as the sentimental side of the question. We have said that the intellect will find little satisfaction in the study, under such conditions as Exoteric Spiritualism provides, of the occult phenomena he finds there. In the family circle he will have rare opportunity; and there is, consequently, much that should engage his intellect which escapes him. Accordingly, he finds himself either perplexed by contradictions, or puzzled by evasions. He asks in vain for light which he is not fitted to receive, and bewilders himself with questions which he is unable to solve. He has entered on another plane of thought than that of simple faith or affectionate love, in which alone he found satisfaction from the pure atmosphere of the home circle.

The mental attitude has changed, and questions press for solution to which he can find no key there. When he attempts to probe phenomena and grasp the reason and method of them, he finds himself astray. There are questions into which he cannot penetrate without taking up what is practically a new study, the complement of that which he has passed through. This is Occultism, since it pleases you so to call it. It is the intellectual side of Spiritualism, and teaches the student the latent powers of his own spirit, and its place in the great world of spirit which surrounds it on every side. In saturating his mind with the lore stored up for him by many a student who has preceded him, he finds that he has entered on a new domain. For the stored up wisdom of the ancients deals entirely with the investigations and researches of those who would penetrate unbidden into the domain of spirit, and would even bind some of its lower powers to their own service and gain. This is not the side that you and those associated with you have approached the subject from. In your day the gate is opened, and entrance on certain conditions is invited. In the days of old the gate was stormed, and the methods are more or less obscurely written for the guidance of the initiated.

In this, occult lore has passed out of sight and has given place to wisdom. There is no room for affection in its simpler developments, but wisdom governs all. The stores laid up are not simple stories of family love which all may read, but records of mysteries of nature, of latent faculties of spirit to be entrusted only to the pure and good in heart and life. Hence to the esoteric world these books are as idle tales. They gain from them no knowledge because they do not possess the key. To the neophyte as he grows in wisdom, they unfold a view of the hidden mysteries of nature, which makes him marvel at his former ignorance. Step by step he advances on his path, and finds at every turn some one to direct and guide him. By degrees he learns to read the history of the world of spirit in which he is a unit. He gains the knowledge which is power, and he progresses by thorny and difficult paths, in which he is sifted through and through, up to the height where the whole panorama breaks upon his gaze. He has not got these without trial, temptation, risk. None gain anything without risk as you ought to know: and to be always counting the cost is no way to soar. The risks that beset occult studies are proportioned to the value of the truths conveyed.

The neophyte must win them, as you know, by conflict and trial. If he be boastfully over-confident, he will find that his pride will have a fall. If he be timid, he will learn that he who would wrest truth from those who guard it must prove his courage. If he be sluggish, he will learn that the seekers after truth must be ever on the alert against danger on the right hand and on the left. If he be impure in thought and life—nay, if he be dominated by the flesh, he will learn to subdue it to the spirit. If he be vacillating and infirm of purpose, he will learn that he who climbs a giddy height must have a clear head. If he be worldly and governed by the world's estimates, he will learn to cast them behind his back. And if he fail to learn these lessons, if he temporise and hesitate, if he linger in temptation and look back in longing to the City of the Plain, then not for him the heights where knowledge dwells. Round his neck is a millstone that will prevent his progress. He has intruded where he had no right to go. He has failed where failure means disgrace, and it were better for him that he had not run the risk. A greater risk still hangs over those who would use their knowledge for base and unworthy purposes. On that we do not dwell. It is not one that concerns you; nor need you seek to know the curse that such accumulate for themselves. It were better for them, assuredly, that they had not been born.

As the neophyte progresses he finds that his troubles decrease; the probation time is over, and the lessons learned in it have become habitual. He finds others who are walking with him, and his courage, purity, sincerity, and perseverance have been proven and approved.

It is not permitted us to tell you much that it will be in your mind to ask. Do not be too literal. There are helps and aids that you know not of; and if there be risks too, those are the conditions of knowledge. Never can aught be had without facing danger and risk. It is impossible, even as it is impossible for you to gain knowledge and progress without conflict. We have answered your request: we shall reply as we are permitted to your questions. Remember only that it is the broad lessons that you should learn, and leave the details for the hereafter. We have ourselves written this, lest you should refuse to accept the statement of Magus. But we should not permit any who is unworthy to have influence over you.

+ IMPERATOR.

Spiritualism and Suicide.

The Religio-Philosophical Journal, commenting upon the suicide of a woman, who having suddenly been bereft of husband and children, had, in despair, taken her own life, says:—“Reader, if you are a Spiritualist, as we hope you are, you know this poor woman cannot escape from herself neither can she at once be happy by a reunion with her loved ones; but you know that the darkness now enveloping her is not eternal; you know that loving messengers from the realms of light are striving to aid her weary steps towards a higher and a happier condition; you know that some time she will join her husband and child. Let us all unite in heart-felt desires for her progress toward light and happiness. The true Spiritualist learns to act unselfishly for the good of others, whether it bring happiness or unhappiness to himself; to act rightly because it is right so to act, and not because of any anticipated reward here or hereafter. Resting securely in his knowledge of a continuous existence beyond the limits of earth-life, and that he will meet his loved ones there, he is prepared to do his best for his brother man. He bears the hardships and sorrows of this life with philosophical calmness and a resignation not born of despair. He knows that all his trials will in some strange way work for his good. A mediumistic soul with a sweet, all-sustaining faith closes a beautiful allegory thus: ‘Our Heavenly Father wakes us from the slumber of infancy and helplessness and sends us forth alone into the world to learn life's great lessons. When we have learned them well, He sends the pale messenger Death, to take us home. How blessed will be that reunion.’ The same writer ends her allegory of ‘The Two Ways’ with this paragraph: ‘There are two ways of journeying through life: One, like the first pilgrim, who thought only of self and of speedily reaching the vale and the journey's end; the other better and wiser one, productive of greater good to all, of making a path, that all who come after us may be blessed by our labours.’ Our unseen friend, Epes Sargent, on his dying bed with the hand of Death already upon him wrote us: "... I look upon it all with the utmost reverence, death being to my eyes a gracious, loving angel, ready to let down the bars at the fitting time, and to welcome me to the great realities of the spirit-world. It is no spectral, ghastly thing to me, but a process full of tenderness and love, carrying some wise purpose which, if veiled to me now, will all be very clear soon.' Instead of uselessly throwing away this life, let each nobly struggle on to the end. He who does this, need have no fears that his influence on earth will cease with his departure; his body will return to the dust from which it came, but the spirit of his work, the essence of his life, will remain to strengthen those who fill his place. This should be an ever-present incentive to the highest endeavour."

CORRESPONDENCE.

[It is preferable that correspondents should append their names and addresses to communications. In any case, however, these must be supplied to the Editor as a guarantee of good faith.]

"Spirit Teachings."
To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me space in your next issue for a very few words on the subject of "(M.A. Oxon's.)" "Spirit Teachings"?

Following them, as I and all your readers must do with deep interest, I have always felt, and increasingly feel, how greatly their interest would be heightened, were the dates of the communications given. For being, as they are, a sort of revision of the spiritual movement and its progress, one longs for the data to accompany such revision, as a standpoint, of which at present one greatly feels the need in perusing the "Teachings."

I venture to think that this need being expressed to "(M.A. Oxon.)" he will kindly and considerably add to the "Teachings" that which will so greatly enhance their value.—I have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient servant,

"LILY."

Miss Corner's Mission Work.
To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Will you kindly permit me to say that I am sending a list of subscribers to "Rhinecland" (2s. 6d.) to the Medium every week? Moreover, that my little work of charity promises to be a success. I should be glad, though, of more help. The more I get the more half-starved little guests can I warm, and feed, and clothe, and give comfort to at the forthcoming Merrie Christmas-tide.

Spiritualism in the Unseen World.
To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I have a book filled with automatic writing, from which I never thought to publish one single extract, but I so completely sympathise with your correspondent, "G. D. Haughton," in refusing to look upon it as a blissful idea that throughout eternity we shall never sleep, that I will gladly copy out for him the exact words that answered automatically more than a year ago my question upon the subject. The last two sentences of one of our many conversations I will copy, since both sound to me very pleasant. I had been speaking of the limitations of this, in many respects, most wonderful writing—of the impossibility there seemed to be of writing by my hand things of which I could form no idea, when I added, "But surely you will be able to tell me whether or not in Heaven I shall find again both love and friendship?" and the answer was:—

"Ah! without both, could I have spoken to one who loves so well, of happiness that is 'perfect.' And love and friendship here are without the drawbacks both must ever know on earth. The constant dread of change, of illness, of alienation, and, worst of all, of death! None of the broken-hearted partings are here that make happiness—perfect happiness—impossible on earth! So try never again, dear S., to 'wonder' whether earth or Heaven is the happier place!"

"You have read my answer more quickly than I can write it, that any world will be Heaven to me where there is no more death. But, good-night now, for I am tired. Tell me if in Heaven we sleep?"

"Oh, yes; like you, we rest often, and like you, we sleep. And we not only sleep, but we dream! Dream of the friends we have left on earth, and wake surprised to find we are not really with them! But now good-night, and may refreshing sleep and pleasant dreams be yours."

Nothing, of course, would have been easier (except for the folly of it) than to have made those simple answers to my own questions myself! But nothing would have been more impossible than for me to have written them in the handwriting I have just copied—a handwriting as exactly like that of the friend from whom they profess to come (when his own hand could hold the pen) as is this writing I am doing now like all my own, in our wonderful book; a book in which there are four or five different handwritings, all simply perfect in their resemblance to the "hands" of those who say they are writing for me; while no amount of practice would enable me to write any hand but my own; and most assuredly I have never copied a single stroke of any writing I ever saw; and so perhaps your correspondent will look upon what I have written as some slight confirmation of his pleasant hope that in Heaven we shall sleep.—I am, sir,

PLYMOUTH.

Mrs. C. Groom, of Birmingham, paid a second visit to the West of England on Sunday, November 18th, and lectured both morning and evening in the meeting-room of the local Spiritualists, Richmond Hall, Richmond-street. There were very large audiences on both occasions, it being exceedingly difficult to procure seats in the morning, while in the evening many persons had to go away for lack of room, as the place was crowded. Additional débat was added to the former gathering by the fact that three children were then publicly named. This ceremony, which was of a simple but impressive character, was somewhat similar to that performed in ordinary Dissenting chapels, with the exception that water was not used. The president of the society, after the opening hymn had been sung, read a selection from the Scriptures bearing upon the event about to take place, and the audience then joined in a hymn appropriate to the occasion. This was followed by an invocation from Mrs. Groom (in the trance state), who then took the children in turn (the two eldest each by the hand, and the third, an infant, in her arms), and named them "in the name of the Cross," at the same time giving to each a spiritual name, accompanied by a white flower as typical of the purity they were intended to attain to. A short address to the audience and the parents, and an earnest aspiration that the newly-named children might be "ever attended by the holy ministers of the Almighty," concluded this part of the proceedings, and the usual service was then proceeded with, the subject for the discourse—"The Two Worlds: Their Influence on Each Other"—being chosen by vote of those assembled out of several subjects handed in. Following the lecture, Mrs. Groom gave a number of clairvoyant descriptions of spirits, seen, as it is alleged, near the persons addressed by her, all of which were recognised. The evening's discourse was on "Spiritualism: The Voice Crying in the Wilderness," and a graphic picture of the woes of human life, concluding with eloquent appeals for purity, justice, and right politically and socially. The attempts to crystallise truth into rigid creeds were condemned, and liberty to think was demanded in order that the world might become wiser and better. As in the morning, poems and more clairvoyant descriptions followed, all of a satisfactory nature, and the service ended with the singing of the hymn "Nearer, my God, to Thee." In the afternoon of the same day Mr. R. S. Clarke lectured at Wood's Coffee Tavern, Stonehouse, to a large audience, the address being a review of recent objections to Spiritualism, and a statement of its probable effects as a movement. Last evening Mrs. Groom delivered her concluding lecture in the Richmond Hall. The subject was "Moses and Carlyle: Were they inspired men?" and the speaker was said to be under the inspiration of "George Dawson." The address was a masterly one, and a large assembly listened with rapt attention. It is quite evident that Spiritualism is making rapid strides in the locality, and sooner or later will have to be dealt with as a power, entirely outside the range of conjurers' exposés and theological animosities.—The Western Daily Mercury.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

J. W. F., BOSTON.—Declined. Too personal, and unsuited to our columns. We have no intention of inserting any such letters.

LILY.—We have made an exception to our hitherto invariable rule in your favour. Names, however, are received in the strictest confidence.

"S."—Thanks for the information you give. We will note any fact about the "Adepts," or the Theosophical Society, but do not see our way to re-opening our columns for the discussion of the subject from a purely speculative point of view.

F. M.—A. G., AND OTHERS.—NEW BOOKS ON SPIRITUALISM, &c. An announcement of several new books will be found on advertisement page II., and a complete list of Theosophical publications on our front page. This notice will be sufficient answer to numerous recent inquiries.

THE LONDON SPIRITUALIST ALLIANCE.

I do not feel it necessary to add anything material to the circular of the London Spiritualist Alliance which the committee have put forward. But I may be permitted to say, as a matter of personal conviction, that I am strongly impressed with the desirability of providing a meeting-place for Spiritualists, and of keeping together a nucleus of those who have so long acted together. I venture to express great confidence, from letters that I have received, that this will be done. Already the response has been large and very cordial.

It is, I may say, very essential that there should be no delay beyond what is absolutely necessary. The preservation of the library of the C.A.S. depends on prompt action. It is imperative that premises be secured for the publishing-office of "LIGHT," and it is very desirable that the Spiritualist Alliance should be so far assured as to be in a position to take rooms of its own in conjunction with "LIGHT" and the PSYCHOLOGICAL PRESS ASSOCIATION, at once. We act rigidly within our means, and I therefore hope that those who wish to co-operate will signify their intention at once.

I am quite unable, amid the pressure of much business, to reply personally to all the letters I receive on this subject. All of them are couched in terms of cordial sympathy, for which my best thanks are due. Many of them contain valuable suggestions which will receive the most careful attention of the committee over which I have the honour to preside. We invite suggestions. We desire, if possible, so to act as to offend none, and to meet the wishes of all. If we fail, it will be, I beg to assure my many correspondents, from no want of attention to the suggestion offered. Our first need, we feel, is a bond of union, and a regular place of meeting, where we can take counsel together, and break down the barrier of isolation which is so destructive to united and successful effort. We shall keep this in view as a first requisite. Frequent social meetings and personal intercourse will make those who charge themselves with the conduct of the Society acquainted with the desires of the members. Real effort to help by judicious means the cause that we all have at heart will lead, we hope, to most beneficial results.

Apologising, therefore, for inability to reply personally to the many letters that reach me, I will undertake to report progress through the columns of "LIGHT" when some definite point has been reached. The sooner I receive responses from those who are disposed to act, the sooner I shall be in a position to say something definite. At least 100 members are needed before the committee will feel justified in taking action. And that action can not be long delayed without the loss of a great opportunity.

"M. A. (Oxon.)"

"The Council of the C.A.S. has addressed to the Members of that Society a circular intimating that it proposes to dissolve."

"At a Conference lately held at the instance of the Council of the C.A.S., I had the honour to propose a plan for the constitution of a Spiritualist Society, which should represent the views of old Spiritualists who do not now find themselves exactly represented by any existing Society. A Committee was formed for the purpose of giving effect to that suggestion; and it is proposed to call the new Society THE LONDON SPIRITUALIST ALLIANCE."

"It is, in the opinion of a large number of Spiritualists, very desirable that there should exist in the Metropolis a society of the kind proposed. There are, I am aware, various kindred societies already in existence. With these we shall be careful in no way to interfere; and with them we shall hope to work in harmony by friendly counsel and co-operation."

"But there are a number of Spiritualists who have been associated together at various kindred times during the past ten years, who, we believe, would desire to perpetuate or to resume that Association under changed conditions adapted to changed times. Their faith has undergone no modification; and they consider this a fitting time to express it once more in union with those who are like-minded with themselves."

"For many divergent opinions on spiritual matters are now before the world. Never before was greater attention paid to the claims of Spiritualism. The Theosophical Society, at one extreme, expresses opinions and holds views in which Spiritualists, as a body, are not able fully to acquiesce. The Society for Psychical Research, while doing excellent work in its own way, is concerned solely, at present, with the external aspects of what is an infinitely vast subject. Under these circumstances it will always find a sphere of action distinct from that which we now contemplate."

"Between these poles, Spiritualists pure and simple, of a type that may now almost be called old-fashioned, find their place, and should take up their position, if they desire to be true to their convictions, and to do their duty in influencing public thought."

"Such a position will be in no sense aggressive. It will involve no large outlay, nor necessitate any pecuniary responsibility beyond the small subscription incident to membership."

"The plan, subject to such modifications as experience may dictate, is simple and unpretending, and may be put thus."

"The C.A.S. possesses a unique library, and various objects of interest to Spiritualists; some of them, indeed, historically valuable, and such as should be preserved as heir-looms for the benefit of Spiritualists in the future. It was proposed at the Conference that, if possible, these should be kept intact; that they should become the property of the new Society; and that they should be acquired by it without cost."

"A room large enough to contain this library, to serve as a reading-room, and as a place for occasional meetings, is easily procurable at a small outlay. The necessary expense of rental need not exceed £50 per annum. Under the same roof it is proposed, as a matter of convenience, by the Editor of 'LIGHT' and manager of the Psychological Press Association, to place the publishing office of that journal and Association."

"It will be seen that an efficient system of organisation will thus be secured. Not only this, but Spiritualists as such will have taken a fitting stand in vindication of their faith at a time when such a step is incumbent upon them. It is, in the opinion of those who are acting in this matter, an imperative duty to keep together a nucleus of those Spiritualists who have so long been associated, and to do by united effort what individual energy is powerless to accomplish for the support of the literature of Spiritualism, as well as for the introduction of it in likely quarters."

"Most incipient organisations have been crushed by the necessity for making appeals for money to those who are disposed to interest themselves in their work, but who resent this continual begging, as they consider it. We do not propose to countenance any system of appeals for money. Money will, of course, be needed; and it will be forthcoming. The small subscriptions of our members will furnish us with an income within which our operation will be rigidly confined. As our work is tested, and found to be good, we have no doubt that our income will grow, and with it our opportunity for usefulness. But in no case shall we transgress the bounds of our income."

"The really important thing is that Spiritualists, many veterans among whom have one by one withdrawn into isolated seclusion, to the great detriment of the cause which they all still uphold by their belief, should make some sacrifice, if need be, in order to unite and take counsel together in times of no little difficulty, and to maintain, among other organisations of those who concern themselves with spiritual things, one which distinctively represents, as none now does, their own special beliefs and convictions."

"It may be well to state explicitly that no profession of faith in any set terms is sought from those who may desire to co-operate with us. We have room for all who realise the importance, in a materialistic age, of expressing a belief that there is something behind matter, and that death does not end all."

"I earnestly trust that old and tried friends of Spiritualism, whose faith is no less assured than my own, and who have done such good service in the past, will feel that there is still work for them which they cannot neglect without injuring what they would desire by every means in their power to support and sustain."

"The Society will be in working order by the opening of the New Year. It is proposed to engage rooms at a rental of not more than £50, in the immediate neighbourhood of Charing Cross; to open a reading-room, where the various Spiritualist papers can be read; to make the library generally available to members; to hold periodical social meetings; and to organise a Sunday service if found desirable. The subscription of Members is fixed at a minimum rate of a guinea."

"I trust you will give us the countenance of your support, and that you will enrol yourself and members of your family as subscribers. Kindly address your reply as soon as convenient to 'M.A. (Oxon.);' care of John S. Farmer, Esq., 38, Great Russell-street, W.C."

"Signed on behalf of the Committee,

Is it Conjuring?

It is sometimes confidently alleged that mediums are only clever conjurers, who easily deceive the simple-minded and unwary. But how, then, about the conjurers themselves, some of the most accomplished of whom have declared that the "manifestations" are utterly beyond the resources of their art?

ROBERT HOUDIN, the great French conjurer, investigated the subject of clairvoyance with the sensitive Alexis Didier. In the result he unreservedly admitted that what he had observed was wholly beyond the resources of his art to explain. See "Psychische Studien" for January, 1878, p. 43.

PROFESSOR JACOBS, writing to the editor of Licht, Mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—"As a Prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the medianic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect. Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. . . . Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also 'the individuality of the spirit' in Spiritual manifestation."

SAMUEL BELLACHINI, COURT CONJURER AT BERLIN.—I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Bern; Butleroff, in St. Petersburg; to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the "How" of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a Notary and witnesses.—(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI, Berlin, December 6th, 1877.

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By M.A. (Oxon.)

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two, of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex; the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential; and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cool breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitching of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over but not in contact with it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous, and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form-manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly—Try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning Spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your Reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good, and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M.A. (Oxon.)"

Dr. du Prel's suggestion, referred to by "C.O.M." in last week's "LIGHT," is important. "He believes that the greater part of man's individual being belongs to what, in relation to our psychophysiological existence, must be called the unconscious. But the threshold of consciousness is not a fixed limit in sleep and in some abnormal states it is pushed back, and by so much as this is the case is our horizon extended, and a larger portion of our total nature included within our realised individuality." We are "spirits in prison," accessible, most of us, only through the avenues of the senses, and dependent on imperfectly received and understood sensations for our knowledge. So it comes to pass that they who regard knowledge as that alone which can be demonstrated by exact proof are limited by a horizon strictly defined by their bodily environment. They, on the contrary, whose spiritual senses are alert, or who have learned to interpret the signs of the spirit—the flash of intuition, the moral fitness and coherence of a theory, the suggested train of thought that leads the soul to the heights of spiritual knowledge where material or mathematical proof finds no place—these enjoy a horizon which is not dissimilar from that which the enfranchised spirit will gain when it enters into the fruition of its experience. That this result can be got by careful training they who have tried will have discovered. That a similar extension of the horizon attends states such as sleep and trance, when the avenues of outlook are enlarged, is by analogy probable, and this consideration illuminates the dark subject of prophetic dreams, presentiments, and that range of investigation which the Society for Psychical Research is now occupied with.

Another thought that arises from Dr. du Prel's speculations works in with and finds its place in the consideration of man's relations to the universe that surrounds him. "Then (i.e., in sleep and in some abnormal states) we come into transcendental rapports with the universal nature with which we are veritably one, and we attain also a measure of time whereby a vast experience may be transacted in what corresponds to a moment of physical existence." This has seemed to me, since I first dimly grasped its significance, a statement that is inherently and beautifully true. Man, the microcosm, is correlated with the macrocosm, the universe in which he finds his place. He acts on it, and is reacted on by it. Not only are we "members one of another," but we are integral and necessary parts of a vast machine, the working of which we may know hereafter, though we cannot follow it now. In this way the truth that underlies the speculations of astrology becomes perceptible, or, at least, conceivable. So viewed, man's place in nature gains dignity, and his life nobility of purpose. His immortal spirit, here placed in one of its many schools of training, is not merely "heir of all the ages," but recipient of the influences which universal nature has stored within her, and which she ministers to him as he can receive them; in the waking and working times of life, one set of grosser experiences; in the silence of sleep, when the gates of the prison-house are ajar, some that are finer and more transcendental, more suited to his higher moods, more indicative of his richer developments. The coarser impressions of sense are in no degree more true, are not, in fact, so real, as the knowledge gained by the soul when the avenues of sense are blocked. But each is needed for full development.

In view of this educational growth of the incarnate spirit, by various methods, and through various experiences, the following comments on some recent notes of mine are instructive:—

Pray allow me to vindicate the position ascribed by you to the Theosophists—but which has also been that of all genuine seekers after Divine communication since the beginning until now—from the reproach of selfishness in declining the control of extraneous spirits. The motive is neither a selfish one, nor is it the fear of affording access to low or bad spirits, but the positive knowledge that it is not only dangerous and injurious to oneself to weaken the bond between oneself and one's own animating, indwelling spirit, by suffering another spirit, whether high or low, to enter in and take possession; but it is injurious to the obsessing spirit itself. To use the faculty of holding converse with visitors, whether from the world of men or the world of spirits, is one thing; but to abdicate the ownership of one's house, and suffer another to occupy it, the owner being meanwhile altogether unconscious of that other's character and proceedings, is another thing, and one that is as unwise and perilous in the case of a spiritual as of a material visitor. It is not by seeking outwards that a man can attain the interior unfoldment which alone can advance him spiritually, or qualify him to help others. Only by climbing the ladder within oneself can one reach the kingdom within, which alone is divine. And to seek to climb by the ladder of others is both to fail oneself, and to keep those others back, by strengthening the bonds which bind them to earth. No doubt some of those who speak in trance are really uttering that which they know of their own spirit, even though they may suppose it to be an extraneous one. But in this case the speaker is conscious, and understands that which is imparted. The true spirit of a man never controls his client, nor, if it can help it, steps aside to allow another to enter. It is a common mistake to suppose that all sudden and vivid suggestions of ideas or other intimations, come from without. A spirit does not cease to be a spirit by becoming incarnate, and it is at least more respectful to one's own spirit to give it the credit for what it tells us, than to set it aside in favour of some wandering stranger. No doubt such visitants may and do gain by association with persons of pure and high intent; but it is enough for this end that they frequent the atmosphere of such persons. It is, however, the case that séance-attending spirits are hardly of the kind to derive real benefit; for owing to their unsubstantiality they are little, if anything, else than mere reflects of the sitters, and change according to their mood,—a fact which accounts for many perplexing anomalies.—E. M.

This, with some slight reservation on some minor points, seems to me a fair presentation of truth. But, in the light of my own experience, I can regard it only as one-sided. I have already stated my own belief in the silent development of man's incarnate spirit by its own energising.* I believe that the recluse, by meditation, by psychical training, by all the methods familiar to the Eastern devotee, can, and does develop the inherent powers of his own spirit. How far he is as really unaided from without as he seems to be, I have not been able to satisfy myself. I am disposed to think that no man is without external help. Certainly I have never felt sure that anything I ever attempted in the direction of personal development, was my own unaided effort. But, however this may be, I have no difficulty in accepting, as a true statement, that man must himself energise, and must not be content with merely being the passive recipient of external influence, if he would "reach the kingdom within which is divine." And while so doing there is no reason to neglect the manifold aids which are ministered to him from without. I do not contemplate the abnegation of that which is my inalienable right—the governance of my own self. I have jealously guarded that right, and have never lost sight of the duty of doing so. But I am none the less conscious of the aid I have received from without, none the less thankful for it. And I do not see how it could be "more respectful to my own spirit," to persist in crediting it with that to which it lays no claim. This, if I may say so without offence, is a fair instance of what I cannot but regard as the one-sided view which the Occultists take of the great questions that equally engage our attention. They are right so far as they go, but they do not go far enough. Spiritualists are in the main right, but they are too apt to ignore what the Occultist exclusively sees. The truth lies four square in a union of the two schemes of opinion.

Chambers's Journal has two remarkable cases of what it calls mind-telegraphy "the accuracy and bona fides of which can be vouched for." The writer is careful to avow that he is "no believer in every casual instance of visions and presentiments"; that was due to the journal in which his narratives are printed. The first is as follows:—

The wife of the writer has a cousin, a lady of extremely nervous and excitable nature, who many years ago was staying with her husband for the season in apartments near Hyde Park. The landlady was a middle-aged woman, apparently a widow; at any rate, she dressed in black; and no one who could in any way be regarded as a landlady was ever visible. Indeed, except the husband of my wife's cousin and a lad who did odd jobs about the house, there was not one of the male sex upon the premises. For some weeks, no untoward incident of any kind happened; the season progressed merrily, and my wife's relatives, whom I may call Mr. and Mrs. W— (I believe they were upon their honeymoon, or, at all events, in the early and enthusiastic stage of matrimony), enjoyed the round of London gaieties without stint. One evening, however, Mrs. W— was dressing to go to the opera. She was alone in the chamber—her husband having, with the superior celerity that pertains to the masculine toilet, completed his attire and descended to the drawing-room—when, to use her own words, "a strange sensation of terror came over me. For some moments I could not define the feeling; by degrees it appeared to assume shape and concentration. I rushed to the door, and opening it, called loudly down the stairs for my husband. He came up in alarm.

"Alfred," I cried, as I re-entered the bedroom upon seeing him approach, "bolt the door: quick, quick!"

"Why, my dear? What is the matter?" was his very natural question.

"Bolt the door; see that it is fast," I rejoined, almost fainting with the weight of dread at my heart. "There is a mad-man in the house."

Of course, Alfred ridiculed my fears, ascribing them to hysteria, over-fatigue, and all the other sources from which I am aware a good many feminine whims take their origin—at all events, in the estimation of the sterner sex. But although soothed by my husband's presence, I was not to be ridiculed out of the intense and vivid consciousness which seemed to possess me, that there was in very truth a lunatic beneath the same roof as myself.

We went to the opera, and returned in due course. No tragedy occurred, nor was there any episode of an unusual nature. But the next morning I heard a cab drive to the door, and saw that it was entered by a gentleman whom I had never seen before. I asked one of the domestics who the gentleman was; and then learned that our landlady was not a widow, but that her husband was in — Asylum. From time to time, during lucid intervals he was permitted to return home for a brief visit of a day or so's duration; and he had paid such a visit the previous afternoon."—Chambers's Journal, November 17th, p. 735.

The other narrative is not less impressive.

Years afterwards, the same lady, Mrs. W— (now a widow), was residing in a suburb of Liverpool, my wife happening to be staying at the time I am about to mention under the same roof. It was an autumn morning, and the family and guests were at breakfast, when Mrs. W— related a dream she had had in the night. Briefly, it was that Miss T—, a young lady neighbour on the eve of being married, had met with a terrible contretemps. She had quarrelled with her brother, who, being exasperated beyond control, so far forgot himself as to strike her a blow upon the face, which greatly disfigured her.

Within half-an-hour, the servant came over from the house of the T—s with a message: "Will Mrs. W— kindly come over to see Miss T— at once? Miss T— has had a bad accident."

My wife's cousin at once went over to the house, and found things in terrible confusion. It was the morning of the wedding, and the party was timed to leave the house almost immediately. But the whole family was in a state of excitement; none were attired for the ceremony; the bride herself was sitting in a chair sobbing hysterically; while a severe bruise upon her face served at once to bring to Mrs. W—'s mind the episode of which she had dreamed. It soon transpired that a quarrel had taken place between the brother and sister—who were foreigners, and perhaps lacked the power of restraint which the cooler-blooded Briton is supposed to possess—in which the young lady had sustained the injury to her face. Her allegation was that her brother had struck her; but his version was that she had fallen against the chimney-piece.

At all events, Mrs. W—'s dream was strangely fulfilled. To complete the story, however, I should mention that the bride's face was judiciously "made up," and a double veil manoeuvred with such dexterity that the wedding ceremony, although delayed, was completed, and the loving pair joined in one without any outsider becoming one whit the wiser as to the contretemps of the morning.—Chambers's Journal, November 17th, p. 736.

The Spiritual Record for the current month gives the commencement of some "Notes towards a History of the Rise in England of Spiritual Manifestations" from the indefatigable pen of Mrs. Howitt Watts. They were written in 1879, and it is wise and well that they should be placed on record. Another historic document receives extended publicity—the report of the committee of the Dialectical Society on Spiritualism. Signor Damiani records a remarkable case of the intervention of a spirit to prevent a ghastly deed of crime. Mr. John Carson sends from Australia an account of experiences eminently worth record. The narrative in which he describes the return of a spirit for the purpose of confessing his sins, and of making peace with his wife, is startlingly true to nature—a story that one cannot conceive of as a rhapsody or romance. He had been a drunkard in life: and had repeatedly promised to reform. "I did intend," he says, "to do so; but the drink-fiend was in me. I was drink-begotten: the curse was on me in my mother's womb: it was impossible for me to reform." How many such miseries are there among us!

The Record, while fully and fairly setting forth the difficulties in the way of an effective organisation of Spiritualists which I have never undervalued, and have indeed stated myself at length in these columns, is courteous and friendly in its commendation of the attempt that I am now making. I wish it were so everywhere. I am unable to conceive what harm it can do to any man that I and those who think with me should unite together for the defence and furtherance of the faith that is the common property of every Spiritualist. If we were setting to work to propagate a special form of belief not held by all, I could understand an attitude of objection. But we are uniting in a profession of the root principles "that there is something behind matter, and that death does not end all." Surely we all believe that—and more. Surely they who unite to further that faith are hurting no one, and are helping that broad Spiritualism which includes within so much divergence on minor points, but none there.

GAMBETTA AND BISMARCK: THEIR RELATIONS TO PSYCHISM.

(Translated from the September number of Psychische Studien.)

Of Léon Gambetta, who died at five minutes before midnight on New Year's Eve, 1882, the Paris Figaro relates "that even he, Free-thinker and esprit fort, supplied the place of religion by a kind of superstition. He believed in two or three prophecies concerning himself, which had already been in part fulfilled. One evening, after dinner at a friend's house, the hostess proposed to tell the guests' fortunes by cards. All agreed, and for half-an-hour were amused at the more or less strange revelations. When Gambetta's turn came, the hostess became suddenly serious, and after spreading out some cards before him, said, 'Strange, that whenever it has occurred to me to deal the cards for you, they have always announced a great danger. To-day, again, they say the same thing.' 'And perhaps they are right,' replied Gambetta, laughing; 'do you know how I am to die, according to a prophecy?' 'No.' 'I am to be killed by a woman.' 'And do you believe that?' 'Yes, and no.' 'You must believe it,' answered the lady; 'just as I am superstitious because I have religion, you must be so because you are Italian. Tell us the story!' Gambetta thereupon informed them that their hostess had been anticipated many years ago by a somnambule, who had told his mother, then childless, that she would have a son, for whom a great career was in store, but an unfortunate end—murder by a woman's hand. Gambetta himself was superstitious, like the Napoleons. He often visited a somnambule in the Rue de Tournon, who predicted to him in the last years of the Empire that he would twice attain to the head of the Government. This witch also confirmed the prediction of her sister at Cahors that he would be killed by a woman. That was two months before his electioneering tour, in which Gambetta obtained so little honour and satisfaction. In Nenbourg the platform on which he was speaking gave way under him, and in speaking of this incident at table, he expressed the apprehension that it might be a sign of his approaching end.

"Bismarck and Religion," by Moritz Busch, in Die Grenzboten (Leipzig) of the 14th December, 1882, contains a very attractive study of the character of the great statesman, closing with a quite unexpected and interesting incursion into the Spiritualistic province.

"There are, in gifted men, in the heroes we revere, dark grounds of knowledge and will, to which ordinary understanding never penetrates, how deep soever it may strive to go, and of which, perhaps, they themselves would be unable to give any clear and sufficient account. 'I should like to sleep, but it thinks, it speculates, in me,' said the Chancellor once at Versailles, speaking of restless nights. What that 'it' was, which thought in him against his will, remains conjectural. Solutions have been offered, but not without doubt.* So is it also with other questions which here break in upon us. . . . Along with religious belief there is also sometimes found in great intellects, something which, by the enlightened world, is called superstition, and which, little as it is rooted in Christianity, stands in a certain connection with religion. There are traces of this in Bismarck.

"In East Prussia is a castle left uninhabited by the owner because he believes it to be haunted by the ghost of a lady who committed a crime there. The ghost appears in open day. This being mentioned once at Bismarck's house and one of those present jesting upon it, the Prince said gravely that there was nothing to laugh at: there might well be something in it, he himself having had experience of something similar. He did not explain himself further on this occasion, but probably alluded to an incident at Schönhausen, of which Hesekiel gives an account.†

"After the battle of Gravelotte there was a discussion at table of the consequences which would follow a complete conquest of the French, and the Chancellor wound up an explanation of his own views with the words, 'But we are talking of the skin of the bear before he is shot. I confess I have a superstition about this.' Possibly he remembered the old Greek envy of the Gods. At Rheims one day before dinner Count Bismarck-Böhlen counted the covers. 'We are not to be thirteen?' he asked. 'No.' 'That is well; the Minister does not like it.' Another time we actually were thirteen at table, and when I noticed it to my neighbour, Buchor, he told me not to say so aloud, as it would disturb the chief.

"On the 14th October, 1870, General Boyer came to Versailles to negotiate with Bismarck on the part of Bazaine, but was put off. Bismarck asked in the Cabinet, 'What is the day of the month?' 'The 14th, your Excellency.' 'That was the day of Hochkirch and Jena; no business must be concluded upon it.' He may have recollected that this 14th was also a Friday. At least, he said on another occasion during the campaign, mention being made of an unsuccessful negotiation, 'That was because it was on a Friday.' And in 1852 he wrote from Halle to his wife, 'I set out on Friday, which was always a dies nefastus,' and went on to recount a succession of vexations on his journey, an inn with bugs and 'infamous coffee,' troublesome companions, &c., &c. When the title of Count was about to be conferred upon him he was for a long time in doubt whether to accept it, a number of noble Pomeranian families so graced having died out in a comparatively short time. 'The land will not endure it,' he said: On the 23rd November, 1870, at Versailles, he spoke in the evening at tea of his death, and gave the exact age which he was destined to attain, and the year in which he should die. When remonstrated with, he replied, 'I know it; it is a mystical number.'‡

"Seven years later, at Varzin, he repeated that assurance to the narrator, with the addition, 'Yet God alone knows.'

"Lastly, it deserves mention that the Chancellor believes the moon to influence all growth, especially of hair and plants. 'You look young again, Counsellor,' he once said jestingly at table to Abeken, when the latter had had his hair cut. 'You have had your hair cut at the right time; the moon is on the increase. It is the same with trees. If it is desired that the stools of birches should strike out and grow, the stem is cut down in the first quarter; if they are to be reduced (geordnet), in the last. Our learned folk will not believe it; but our foresters know better, and proceed accordingly, and the result of their management proves them right.*

* There is here a reference to Zollner's "Transcendental Physics," in which the problem of this impersonal thinking, so to speak, is discussed. The translator regrets that this interesting speculation is not included in the English version. With much besides from the same work, it remains in MS., no appropriate place having been found for it in the chapters descriptive of the experiments with Slade, to which, and to the hypothesis connected therewith, the published translation is almost exclusively confined.—TRANS.

† Which follows in the text. I omit it, being quite unable to discover any sufficient evidence of the ghostly visitation implied.—TRANS.

‡ I have underlined these words, wishing to call attention to these "mystical numbers" in connection with individual lives. As regards fateful days also, the coincidences recorded in history alone would make an interesting and impressive list, and in private families the same thing is far more frequent than I think the doctrine of chances would lead us to expect.—TRANS.

"The clearest thinker in the political world, with a depth and reach of view beyond all his contemporaries, constantly right, and far superior to conventional opinion; at the same time a ghost-seer, a chooser of days, a reckoner with mystical numbers!"

What are we to think of it? Shall we call it with the Figaro, 'a kind of superstition,' or with Moritz Busch, a merely 'congenital and developed propensity to mysticism'? Are, then, both these statesmen, the most distinguished of the age, 'ghost-seers'?

We will take first the case of Gambetta, who believed in certain prophecies imparted to him through cards and somnambulists. In the report of the Figaro there is no trace of any so-called 'ghost-seeing.' What we have to do with in both cases is only the force or gift of clairvoyance elicited in the persons in question by means of cards or the somnambulist state. Dr. Fahnestock has made us acquainted by his articles with the great range of these statuvolic conditions. In this light we must rather regard as "mere superstition" the supposition that casting the cards is absolutely worthless. It has certainly the same significance as the genuine mediumistic automatic writing, when freed from the ghost idea. We, of course, do not speak of every variety of that phenomenon, but observe that there can be statuvolic conditions in one who seems completely awake. That is often the case with those who tell fortunes by cards. That they may hit upon, i.e., clairvoyantly perceive, the whole life-truth, I can vouch from a personal experience. When, in 1857, I was about to marry my first wife, she induced me to go with her for a jest to a then celebrated Bohemian fortune-teller by cards. I was absolutely incredulous. The woman had not the remotest knowledge of either of us; but as to what she prophesied of my future wife, that she might have drawn from her long experience and knowledge of mankind, perhaps guessing that the lady was a young widow and was to be married to myself, so that when she dealt the cards for me, and of course predicted my approaching marriage with a widow, I was not at all struck by it; but she went on to say 'that in a short time I should be the possessor of many houses.' I was as poor as a church mouse, nor with my betrothed had I the slightest prospect of that. I left the Sybil, shaking my head and incredulous. A few weeks later I was quite unexpectedly offered the post of secretary to an official house-agency, which I accepted, and for ten years I had the management of from twenty to ninety houses!† Was this mere fortuitous guess-work, or was it clairvoyance? The chief, to whom I owed the appointment, was the legal guardian of the children of my wife's first marriage. The psychic nerve-aurea of my betrothed was a mirror of the present and near future presented to the deeply-penetrating glance of the clairvoyant card dealer. This may have been the case also with Gambetta's mother, and with himself. The solution of the riddle lies indeed in the metaphysical cognition of the connection of all things, for which time and space, as we conceive them, are not, all being focussed to a point for the intuitive clear perception.

[After some remarks of no very decided or definite

* If one can trust statements to be found in astrological books and almanacs, experiments of this kind have repeatedly been made in woods and gardens, and have always proved the fact of the moon's influence. Here, then, is perhaps a case in which the unintelligent and uninformed scepticism of the "enlightened" classes has actually been fatal to the progress of science in a most practical department.—TRANS.

† This article is unsigned, and is presumably by M. Aksakow himself. ‡ Some years ago I was staying with a relative in Wales, and hearing of a lady in the neighbourhood who had a reputation for successful fortune-telling by cards, I obtained an introduction to her, and she obligingly complied with my request for a trial of her skill. Suffice it to say, without going into private details, that she made a prediction of great importance to me, which, as I interpreted it, I knew to be highly improbable and which was exactly fulfilled by an event then so far more improbable, that the possibility of it never occurred to me till it was about to happen, some time after another circumstance foretold in connection with it had actually happened.—TRANS.

character upon the other beliefs attributed to Prince Bismarck, the article continues:—]

Finally, as to Bismarck's belief in the influence of the moon upon growth, this also is not without a certain justification. We live in the universal nexus of things; everything, therefore, so also the moon, has its reciprocity of influence on our earth-life. The old astrologers were not wholly without reason in their belief in the influence of the planets and stars on our birth and life; the fundamental idea upon which they went is still a principle valid for our own thought; but unluckily, their specific applications and calculations were often totally wrong. It is the same with the belief in a spirit-world beyond our own. We must concede its existence theoretically and in general as the foundation of all being and thinking; but we are not in a position directly and specifically to derive certain effects in our organism from the action of extra-mundane spirits. All forces interact so intimately in the universe that a definite personification of them in individual cases is highly misleading.

Note by Translator.

Without disputing that clairvoyance may sometimes and in some degree enter into systems of divination by objective means, I take leave to question the sufficiency of this explanation in general. Cartomancy, for instance, of which there are many systems, has definite significations for the cards, and rules of interpretation which certainly guide the intuition of the practitioner. The latter divines through the cards, which are not mere instruments, like Braid's metal discs, for inducing the statuvolic condition. It may seem to favour the view taken by the author of the above article, that success of this sort cannot be commanded by merely learning the rules of the art, but a natural qualification in the diviner counts for a great deal. And this qualification is something more than mere astuteness. It rather resembles the facility with which one person will grasp the meaning of a sentence in a foreign language, while another, with perhaps even a superior knowledge of its grammar and rules of construction, may puzzle long over it for want of a certain mental sympathy. But how then are we to conceive a real accommodation of such a thing as a pack of cards, dealt by rule, to human life and affairs? Now there is in certain circles at present a fashion, half jocular, half serious, of referring paradoxical difficulties to the "fourth dimension." I find it easy to conceive generally that, given a meaning to be expressed by a definite adjustment of external material objects, that adjustment can be effected with absolutely no trace of disturbance in the space of which we have cognizance. It is, of course, not to be supposed that some individual agent—a "spirit"—is manipulating the cards in the fourth dimension. They will fall into their places in obedience to a law and by a force expressing the all-pervading sympathies and correspondences of nature. (On this subject, see Jamblichus "On the Mysteries.")

The "spiritual" theory, although the simplest and most rational explanation of the phenomena of Modern Spiritualism, appears to be the very last solution to which our opponents are inclined to give credit. They may be anything or everything—but spiritual in their nature and origin. Of all the unpopular subjects which have, from time to time, come under the notice of mankind, Spiritualism has perhaps been accounted for, and explained in the most absurd and illogical manner—by the cracking of knee or toe joints, by electricity, magnetism, mesmerism, psychic force, imposition, imagination, and nothing at all. But the theory which ascribes them to any source save the interposition of disembodied spirits fails to cover all the ground. That this is so we have ample proof in the records of the scientific research of not a few investigators, such as Wallace and Crookes in England, Mapes and Hare in America, Flammarion in France, Fichte, Zöllner, and Scheibner in Germany, and others, many of whom started their investigation in complete antagonism to the spiritualistic theory, but who were in every case driven step by step from explanation to explanation, until at last they confessed that the phenomena could be accounted for in no other way, or attributed to no other source.

"WHO ARE OUR SPIRITUAL ENEMIES?"

A PATCHWORK FROM BÖHME.

By A. J. PENNY.

IV.

The fall of Lucifer is described by Böhme as having been caused by his sense of power leading him to despise "the meekness and lowliness in which consisteth the Kingdom of Heaven, and the virtue of the heart of God." "He saw (he tells us) the greatest hidden mysteries of the Deity stand in such humility, he took offence at it, and entered into the fierce might of the fire, and would domineer with his own self-wit and reason over the heart of God: he would that God should be in subjection under him, he would be a framer and creator in nature, and therefore he became a devil." ("Threefold Life," chap. 4, par. 61.)

I am, of course, very far from thinking that by this crude statement, I convey any adequate notion of what these words were meant to indicate,—as far as I am from thinking that I fully understand them; but I understand enough for my immediate purpose, which is to shew how evil and enmity began among the "throne angels," and let us hear Böhme's account of these before we go further. "Behold, when God set the Fiat in the will and would create angels, then the Spirit first separated all qualities after that manner as you now see there are many kinds of stars, and so the Fiat created them. Then there were created the princely angels and the throne angels, according to every quality out of the source of the Fire, a similitude whereof you have in the stars, how different they are." (Note that the three first forms of Eternal Nature and the darkness they move in are necessarily prior in action to the opening of the "source of fire.") "Now the throne and princely angels are every one of them a great foundation." . . . "Out of each fountain came forth again a centre in many thousand thousands." . . . "Every host which proceeded out of one and the same fountain got a will in the same fountain which was their prince." ("Three Principles," chap. 11, par. 2.)

Now, "when the moving to the creating of the angels was effected, then," . . . "the properties stood in great working and did will to be creatureal. In these properties did the creaturely will of Lucifer create; when he did apprehend the omnipotence therein, and found the wonder doing power in himself." ("Seventh Theosophic Question," pars. 4 and 5.) "And instantly the properties in him became revealed or manifested, viz., the cold fire"—(query, what we mean by negative electricity?)—"also the sharp, hard, bitter, stinging painfulness or torment of the fire: thus became he an enemy of all love, humility, and meek gentleness." (Ibid, par. 7.)

Why thus? "Because every property keepeth its own desire, for a property is nothing but a hunger, and the hunger doth form itself into such an essence as itself is." . . . "The dark hunger desireth essence according to its property, viz., earthly things; and the bitter hunger desireth bitter raging, stinging pain; and the hunger of anguish desireth anxious hunger; also the melancholy taketh the desire to die, and continual sadness." ("Signatura Rerum," chap. 14, pars. 52-56.) (Alas! we have not far to seek for proof of this; we find it in ourselves; we bewail it in other people!)

And, further, Lucifer "desired to be an artist. He saw the Creation, and understood the ground, wherein he would be an own self-God, and rule with the central fire's might in all things, and image himself with all things, in all forms, that he might be what he would, and not what the Creator would; as, indeed, this is still to this day their greatest joy" (the hosts of Lucifer) "that they can transmute themselves into many images, and thus achieve or make fancy." ("Tenth Theosophic Question," par. 1.)

It was just this self-chosen application of power—this willing in opposition to the holy will of the whole of God's eternal nature, that brought the mighty rebel and all his hosts, in Böhme's language, "out of the temperature." "This is the very abomination before God that the life's forms are gone out from the equal agreement" ("Fourth Text of Apology 3," point 2, par. 66), for "nothing is evil which remaineth in the equal accord, for that which the worst doth cause and make with its coming forth out of the accord, that likewise maketh the best in the equal accord."

. . . "all was very exceeding good, but with its own elevation and departure out of the equality it becomes evil, and brings itself out of the form or property of the love and joy into a painful tormenting form and property." . . . "King Lucifer stood in the beginning of his creation in highest joyfulness, but he departed from the likeness. He forsook his order, and went out of the harmony wherein God created him; he would be lord of all, and so he entered into the austere fire's domination, and is now an instrument in the austere fire's might, upon which also the all-essential spirit striketh and soundeth upon his instrument; but it soundeth only according to the wrathful fire's property." ("Signatura Rerum," chap. 16, pars. 6, 7.) I think we have now sufficient data to understand why, if "out of every form as a well spring go forth spirits" with the same will as that of their awakening Prince, the soul of man, which subsists in the perpetual interaction of the seven forms of Eternal Nature, must live among enemies to peace, externally as well as internally, constitutionally opposed to its welfare, until all are atoned, made one in equal action by perfected evolution. Now, by such unsuitable terms as outer and inner, which in a deeper sense no one could use regarding spirits, I only mean to indicate that enemies arise from the discords of other souls as well as from those beginning in our own.

PSYCHOLOGICAL EXPERIMENTS.

At the close of my letter in "LIGHT," last week, I referred to a case of exalted sensibility observed by Professor Charcot, Dr. Gamjee, and others at Paris. In the September number of Psychische Studien, we read:—"Professor Dr. B. J. writes us: 'In Paris, G. Lyon has for some months been making experiments of extraordinary importance with an hysterical patient, and has carried further Charcot's investigations. The following are some of the results. (1) The sensibility of the hypnotised subject surpasses all previous conception, and is comparable to that of a photographic plate. (2) The so-called magnetism of the glance is an effect of light, the eye serving as a reflecting mirror; no effect in complete darkness. (3) The hypothesis of an actual efflux (Fluidums) in animal magnetism is to be rejected.' [This, says Psychische Studien, is not yet quite clear, but adds in a note: Dr. W. Baker Fahnestock, at Lancaster, in Pennsylvania, a high authority in this department, likewise disputes the fluidic emanation, and explains the magnetic phenomena by mere excitation and statuvolic self-activity of the subject.] 'It is my conviction,' continues the correspondent of Psychische Studien, 'that we are on the threshold of a colossal discovery, which, however, will exalt to the throne, not materialism with its flat denial of spirit, but the genuine science of spirit, suppressing all contradictions. I will write further concerning Lyon's experiments.'"

It would above all be interesting to know whether the fact of tactual sensibility, excited by objects out of physical contact with the organism, is confirmed. In that case, provided the suggestion that it is only an increase of temperature that is perceived can be excluded, the admission of the mesmeric efflux becomes unavoidable.

HINTS FOR INQUIRERS INTO SPIRITUALISM.

In accordance with our policy of occasionally publishing articles suitable for inquirers, we this week print the first of two or three short articles which seem suitable for this purpose. In connection with this the "Testimony to Psychical Phenomena" and "Advice to Inquirers," on page 511, should be read.

Home Circles.—Suggestions and Rules by Giles B. Stebbins.

How shall we investigate Spiritualism? is asked from all quarters and from every land. To know more of man's inner life—of his spiritual faculties and relations—is the need and demand of the world; a need more pressing, a demand wider and more urgent, than exists touching any kindred subject.

Public mediumship has done much, and is doing much, to help this investigation, and the genuine and devoted medium is worthy of all commendation, but we greatly need more home study and experience. The quiet privacy, the sacredness, the trust which comes with mutual affection and reverence ripened by long acquaintance, the harmony and confidence which banish unjust suspicion yet do not lessen watchful care, all help to the best results, and all exist in the highest degree in well ordered homes. More home sances, and more thoughtful study of psychological laws and powers, will be of great use.

The Psalmist said: "While I was musing the fire burned." If we choose our seasons of quiet thought and self-communion, that sacred fire will burn and the light within will be revealed.

To sit in circles, or to witness the best mediumship, as mere wonder-seekers eagerly looking for some test of spirit-presence, but paying no heed, and giving no thought, to the wondrous powers of the spirit in us, is of small benefit—often a positive injury. Such moods and methods darken and belittle, give no inspiration, no inner light, no richer or truer life, no higher comprehension of the grandeur and beauty of immortality.

* From "Home Circles," &c. Religio-Philosophical Publishing House, or of the Psychological Press Association.

To consult the spiritual intelligences as infallible authority, or to ask their help and weakly rely on them in matters of selfish gain or of ordinary life, is unwise and enervating. As our true friends on earth will help us in sore need, so may our heavenly friends help in like great troubles, but it is best, as a rule, that we help ourselves. No voice of angels which contradicts the reason and intuition of man is to be heeded, for they are fallible like ourselves—often wiser, yet liable to err.

We must always bear in mind that we are dealing with human beings who come back to us from a higher realm of the eternal life. We are spirits clad in mortal bodies; they are spirits clad in incorruptible and immortal bodies, too fine for our dull outward eyes to see. Some of those who come back are below us in honesty and intelligence, others are above us; they all gain and grow in grace in the higher light of their abiding place. The angel is the man reaching toward wisdom and love and harmony,—glorious and majestic, yet not infallible,—there are no angels, save the spirits of just men and gracious, true women. Their highest faculties and greatest powers are but the development of like faculties which are in germ in us. Clairvoyance, for instance, is the spiritual sight, not dependent on our outward eyes, but most perfect when those are closed. We get glimpses of clairvoyance here; it may be the common vision of the Life Beyond.

While the circle should be open and friendly to the spirit-world, it can also be a school of psychological or spiritual science,—a help to know more of psychometry, clairvoyance, magnetism, the gift of healing, and all subtle and far-reaching faculties in ourselves. Thus we shall learn a new self-reverence, discover wonderful results of our own powers, and yet witness the finest spirit-manifestations, gain the highest spiritual communion, and learn that the spirit-world above us is best understood by those who know most of the spirit-life within us. Self-knowledge brings light, thoughtless ignorance and credulity darken the vision. Intelligent Spiritualists can be the best psychological students. They have, indeed, the only basis for a rational psychology, such as the world needs. While the spiritual philosopher will prize the beauty and significance of the facts of spirit presence, he can understand that back of all outward signs are HUMAN INTUITIONS—the best teachers, with their lessons confirmed by facts. It is the inmost spirit of man which says: "Thou shalt never die!"

To shew the beauty of our interior faculties, and to emphasise the necessity of a culture of these gifts in aid of the finest spiritual experiences, an extract is given from the account by Andrew Jackson Davis of his first clairvoyant vision ("Magic Staff," p. 214, &c.). After describing the room in Poughkeepsie, the persons present and the magnetiser, he continues (in January, 1844, he was seventeen years old):—

"I concluded I was physically in a deep sleep, mentally in a peaceful reverie. * * I observed an intense blackness, apparently enveloping the earth for hundreds of miles. Gradually this disappeared; and as gradually my perception was awakened and enlarged. All things and persons in the room were surprisingly illuminated. Each human body glowed with many colours, more or less brilliant and magnetic, * * the head was very luminous—the emanations extended from four inches to as many feet. * * I was overwhelmed, but continued to observe, as one in solitude, with unspeakable joy and holy reverence. A few moments more, and I beheld the interiors and the hidden sources of these luminous emanations. In my ordinary state I had never seen the human viscera, but now I saw all the organs and their functions. The whole body was as transparent as glass! It was invested with a strange, rich spiritual beauty. Each separate organ had centres of light, besides being enveloped in a general sphere

CURATIVE MAGNETISM.

The Société Scientifique des Etudes Psychologiques, of Paris, distributes its work among committees, one of which is called the Section Magnétique. The Society's last monthly report informs us that the interest in the practical proceedings of the magnetic section is so increasing that its place of meeting is inconveniently crowded. Physicians and students are among the visitors; they come animated with the ordinary professional notion that all bona fide magnetic phenomena can be explained by hypnotism upon hysterical subjects. Being soon disabused of this error, they remain among us as inquirers.

Every séance offers some special points of interest. At that of October 23rd, there was an interruption of the ordinary course of experiment. The reporter says:—

"At this séance I put a photograph into Madame Samier's hand while she was in the magnetic sleep. It was that of a young friend of my own, who, three days before, had, in a moment of despair, shot himself. I had not mentioned anything of the circumstance to anyone. Madame S. described the living original, and said that her feeling was that there had been a vital disruption (une rupture fluidique). Conducted by my thought to his abode, she described him as he was there in life—his going out, returning, putting a pistol to his temple, and firing it. She seemed to feel the shock, fell in a fainting cataleptic state, out of which we had some difficulty to draw her. Then followed a scene interesting to students of mediumship. Madame S., who is not only impressible to magnetism but is a seeing medium, seemed to us to perceive the spirit of the unhappy young man, passed into the trance state, addressed him in terms of reproach and regret, then knelt and uttered a most moving prayer in his behalf. At the close of this we recalled her to resume our ordinary course of proceeding.

"We had just terminated our séance, when another incident occurred with Madame Samier. A gentleman, who had arrived in Paris only four days before, was placed en rapport with her. She described him as coming from the Ile de la Réunion on the steamer, Caledonian, his having an almost fatal faintness in his bath during the voyage; and she seemed to feel the agony which he had then felt. All this, the gentleman said, was exact. We had to be very patient in bringing her out of this state."

Men in practice are invited in this section, on certain evenings, to discourse upon the subject of Curative Magnetism. Addresses by M. Adolphe Didier and M. Hippolyte are reported. The former gave an outline of its progress in England, where he had practised until recently for nearly forty years; spoke of the advocacy of it, under the name of Mesmerism, by Dr. Elliotson and other physicians, by Archbishop Whately, by Miss Martineau, and others. He referred to facts within his own knowledge and to competent authorities, to shew the advantages of surgical operations being performed while the patient is in the magnetic sleep instead of that induced by chloroform and other chemical anesthetics. He regarded the magnetic action in healing, although physical in effect, as spiritual in principle. He believed it probable that spirits participated in the good work of healing. He related that once he received an urgent message from the family of a lady living at a great distance from London, where he resided, for him to go to magnetise her; she was reported to be in a sinking condition from typhoid fever. While hesitating as to the probability of being of service, considering time and the distance, he heard an internal voice bidding him go with courage and good assurance. He went, magnetised at once with faith and energy. The lady rallied and made a rapid recovery. He thought all were endowed, more or less, with the faculty, and that it ought to be fostered and exercised in families.

peculiar to itself. For example the auricles and ventricles gave out distinct flames of light, and the pericardium was a garment of magnetic life, surrounding and protecting the heart. The various air chambers seemed like chemical laboratories. The fire in them, wrought instantaneous chemical changes in the blood; and the great sympathetic nerve whose roots extend through the lower viscera, and whose topmost branches are lost in the superior strata of the sensorium, appeared like a column of life, interwoven and blended with a soft and silvery fire! * * The brain seemed like a crown of spiritual brightness, with shining crescents and flaming jewels. * * Without conscious effort I could discern the whole mystery and beauty of the human economy—and enjoy that festive illumination which the ten thousand flames of the golden candles of life imparted to every avenue, pillar, chamber, window, and dome of the human temple. * * The sphere of my vision widened, the village was open before me, the broad earth for hundreds of miles became transparent. By a process of inter-penetration, as I now term it, I was placed en rapport with Nature. The spirit of Nature and my spirit had formed what seemed to me a kind of psychological or sympathetic acquaintance—the foundation of a high and eternal communion. The properties and essences of plants were distinctly visible. Every fibre of the wild-flower or atom of the violet was radiant with its own peculiar life. * * Earth gave off one colour, stones another, minerals another. Everything had a glory of its own. * * In this mysterious vision, gentle reader, I saw everything just as you will—with the penetrating senses of the spirit—after you have passed away from the visible body at physical death. * * Every little grain of salt or sand; every minute plant or flower; every tendril of the lofty trees; the minerals and ponderous animal forms—each and all were clothed with a dark or white atmosphere, with an infinite variety of shades and degrees of brilliancy and refinement. * * In each mineral, vegetable, and animal I saw something of man! The whole system seemed to me like fragments of future human beings."

We are gaining new evidences that man has a dual body,—an outward and physical form with its external senses, and an interior form, real yet usually invisible, with its finer spiritual senses; and that death destroys the outer body only to release this inner form—which it does not and cannot touch—that it may enter the upward path to a higher life. When the material eye is closed, the clairvoyant eye opens; when the outward ear is sealed, the clairaudient sense awakens, and these inner senses are far-reaching and delicate beyond our outward senses. Sometimes they are active in this life; in the next life they may give broader range and finer perception to the spirit. To understand the co-existence of these two bodies here, their separation at death, and the continued organic existence of the inner, or spiritual body, opens the way for the best spirit communion.

One closing word—last but not least, in importance. For satisfaction or success in the circle, the motive and spirit of the members must be good, their character and conduct true and pure. Vulgar and idle curiosity creates inharmonious, destroys all serenity and sanctity, and makes success well-nigh impossible. Vicious and degrading habits, dishonesty, or selfishness have like untoward results.

Tennyson well says:—

"Do we indeed desire the dead
Should still be near us at our side?
Is there no baseness we would hide?
No inner villainess that we dread?"

* * * * *
How pure at heart and sound in head,
With what divine affections bold,
Should be the man whose thoughts would hold
An hour's communion with the dead.

In vain shalt thou, or any, call
The spirits from their golden day,
Except, like them, thou too canst say,
My spirit is at peace with all."

M. Hippolyte fully accorded with M. Didier as to the effects of Curative Magnetism being due to spiritual action. He said that, although the power seemed to come at his desire and operate at his initiative, he knew that it could act independently of his will. It might be that the benevolent will of the magnetiser brought good spirits into rapport with him and that they co-operated, through his mediumship, with their clairvoyance and with the forces at their disposal. Being a Spiritualist, he saw nothing marvellous in this. He thought all, with love and good-will for the neighbour, might obtain results similar to those with which he was familiar. Prayer and spiritual sympathy were inseparable from his proceeding. His power had increased in proportion to his exercise of it and his desire to do good. Many of the maladies which came under his treatment, he thought were occasioned by disturbing causes of a spiritual or moral order—the results of previous excesses or evil actions. In such cases he did not expect to relieve the bodily disease unless he could touch and relieve the mind.

SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH.

Last week we were able to give only a brief report of the general meeting of the Society for Psychical Research, held on the 22nd ult. A somewhat fuller account of what passed may be interesting to our readers. Mr. F. W. H. Myers gave, as forming part of a report of the Committee on Thought-transference, a detailed account of a series of experiments on the transference of the sensation of taste, made by himself, Mr. E. Gurney, and Mr. Malcolm Guthrie, of Liverpool. Special care was taken when odoriferous substances were used that the sense of smell should not be available. But equally remarkable results were obtained with substances entirely destitute of smell. Without having the exact facts before us, we should say, that in considerably more than half the trials the "subjects" accurately detected the substance tasted by the operators; in about a quarter of the number the answers were approximate, and in the remainder quite incorrect. A variety of questions were put from the meeting as to the possibility of the "subjects" obtaining a clue by any ordinary channel, and which were clearly and decisively answered.

Mr. Malcolm Guthrie gave a most interesting account of a few experiments in which attempts had been made by "subjects" to discover a few words, or a proverb, or an historical scene fixed upon and mentally thought of by a company of persons. In one remarkable instance, the scene chosen was Queen Elizabeth going to her State barge, and Sir Walter Raleigh throwing down his cloak for her to walk on. This was, after some difficulty and hesitation, accurately fixed upon and described even to the naming of the two principal personages. This was done under circumstances which seemed to preclude the possibility of the ideas being conveyed by any ordinary means.

At the close of a description of some experiments in Thought-transference, Mr. Guthrie exhibited a large series of drawings obtained in a similar way to those which have been already published in the "Proceedings" of the Society, but with several new "subjects." In all these cases the transferred impressions were produced without spoken word or contact of any kind. A large number of the copies were as accurate as would ordinarily be made from memory by a person who had seen the original.

Professor Balfour Stewart called attention to the difference between assertions which introduce confusion into the recognised body of scientific results, and those which merely require an extension of a working hypothesis. He pointed out that the rejection, as contradictory of known biological laws, of such facts as those which have been under consideration, is illogical. He claimed that the experiments and observations made by the Society do not introduce confusion into the body of science, but they merely require an extension of an existing hypothesis, and that in this respect there is a similarity to what took place on the first introduction of electrical facts. What biologists have to do is to ascertain whether the results obtained by the Society for Psychical Research are realities, and, if so, they must somewhat modify their hypothesis. Professor Balfour Stewart said that as far as the mesmeric results lately brought forward are concerned, it is alleged by certain biologists that those had been investigated many years ago, and were proved to be due to collusion. With regard to this statement, he might mention that he is well acquainted with one who took a prominent part in those previous observations. His conclusion was merely "not proven," and he takes the greatest interest in the proceedings of this Society, and is quite willing to give them due consideration. In concluding his remarks Professor Balfour Stewart said that if any of their opponents would kindly send in their names, the Society would gladly give them access to the evidence at its disposal, and he submitted that this was the only way in which they could arrive at a legitimate conclusion.

Professor Barrett spoke of the extension of successful experiments in Thought-transference in new quarters, mentioning in particular some which he had received an account of from Sheffield, accompanied with remarkable drawings. He also described a long series of experiments which had convinced him of the extraordinary degree to which "Muscle-reading" could be carried. In one case, if we understood correctly, the point of one finger resting on the left hand was found to convey sufficient indication to guide the movements of the right hand. As evidence that in such cases the effect was really due to Muscle-reading, Professor Barrett said that the interposition of a small piece of cotton-wool was found entirely to preclude the obtaining of any result. Some experiments illustrative of the varying power of the silent will at different distances were very interesting.

The President of the Society, Professor Sidgwick, in the few remarks which he made, dwelt upon the importance both of the accumulation of facts and experiments, and of the extension of the area from which they are obtained, in order, as he said, to force those who deny the genuineness of the phenomena to the logical alternative that a continually increasing number of persons of unblemished character must be "in the trick."

A report of the Committee on Mesmerism, and a report of the Literary Committee (with reference to the replies received to the circular on Dreaming and Allied States), were deferred for want of time.

A second edition of the circular on Dreaming and Allied States has been issued to the members of the Society and for private circulation. Copies of this circular may be obtained on application by post or otherwise, at the Society's rooms, 14, Dean's-yard, S.W.

WHAT OUR CONTEMPORARIES SAY.

Organisation.

Light for Thinkers (Atlanta, Ga.) thinks there can be no mistaking the signs of the times. They, universally, point to the more thorough organisation of Spiritualists. Many arguments have been offered against organisation—but the most prominent one has been that we are not ready for it. The fear of Spiritualists fossilizing upon articles of faith is a fear that no longer haunts the imaginative brain. It is dispelled by the consciousness that Spiritualists can rally only upon a fact.

MR. S. C. HALL.—It will gratify many of our readers to know that this venerable author of so many books—and whose life has been largely spent in works of benevolence and mercy, detailed and described in his latest publication, "Retrospect of a Long Life"—is about to become again a permanent resident at East Molesey. It will be remembered that he did much good service to the locality while residing there in 1880-1, among other things forming a village library, to which he presented over 500 books, with the fittings. His wife, the well-known and greatly-esteemed authoress, whose name is so closely associated with so many valuable and useful charities, died at Devon Lodge, Palace-road, East Molesey, on the 30th January, 1881. But in a letter to a friend, who has communicated it to us, he writes, "The place is by no means, therefore, gloomy, or distasteful to me. Indeed, it is the contrary, for there she passed from earth to Heaven." Mr. Hall adds, "I like the place, the people (high and humble), its peculiarly salubrious air, the vicinity of the Thames, the charming drives or walks in all directions, the view of princely Hampton Court" (from the graceful bridge), "its gardens, and in especial the glorious tree avenue of Bushey, and its close neighbourhood to the railway terminus, that brings visitors in little over half-an-hour from the heart of London. Molesey is in fact a village of villa houses: nothing like poverty assails the ear or eye, while at least once a week there is some festival in the park, to gladden the minds and hearts of those who delight to see crowds in happy holiday enjoyment. I shall be well content, far more than that, to pass the residue of my long life at East Molesey, where I have, thank God, many friends who will cheer and comfort and counsel me as near the end of a very long life, with many blessings, besides that of sound health of body and mind for which to thank an abundantly merciful God."

CORRESPONDENCE.

[It is preferable that correspondents should append their names and addresses to communications. In any case, however, these must be supplied to the Editor as a guarantee of good faith.]

The Spiritual Ministry of Healing.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—A few years ago I related in the spiritual journals, how I was cured of a cancerous tumour, of long standing, by spiritual agency, through the healing mediumship of Dr. Mack, a cure which I am happy to say is permanent. It is now my grateful duty to record another and more recent personal experience of a like healing ministry. For a long time, I had been subject to attacks of partial deafness, increasing in frequency, intensity, and duration, and which, at length, culminated in almost complete deafness, accompanied by distressing noises in the head, and especially of a sound like the tolling of a bell, which continued day and night without a moment's intermission, so that for months together I could scarcely get any sleep. Under this strain, my health became seriously impaired, and my nervous system so weakened that I feared insanity might ensue unless some relief could be speedily obtained. As Dr. Mack had left England I applied to a lady who had been his assistant, and who was especially successful in her treatment of this class of cases, Miss Peele, 67, Albert-street, Regent's Park. She consulted her spiritual physician, who said there was paralysis of the auditory nerve, with gatherings in the head from the breaking of an abscess. The case was a very difficult one, but that with patience and perseverance a cure might possibly be effected. I visited Miss Peele for treatment three times a week. During the first week on each occasion a considerable quantity of matter (not serum) was drawn through the ears by mesmerising alone; we then ejected water into the ears by a syringe to facilitate this discharge, the mesmerising being still continued as before. At the end of six weeks of this treatment I was completely cured; my hearing is wholly restored. I have recovered my nervous tone, and my health is very greatly improved. I may mention that Miss Peele said on each occasion of treatment, as soon as she began magnetising, she felt the pressure of invisible hands on her shoulders, and that she ceased the moment the pressure was withdrawn. I had ample corroboration of the co-operation of an independent intelligence; raps were heard upon my chair and all around us, responding to questions and giving directions as to treatment. During the last week of my treatment Miss Peele was on a visit to Cambridgeshire, but she said she would make an effort to magnetise me from thence at half-past ten every evening, if I would sit for the purpose. This effort was successful. Every evening I was able to sit alone and undisturbed. I realised a magnetic influence as perceptibly as if she had been personally present. On the Wednesday evening of that week, however, I had no perception of anything of the kind, and went to bed, dismissing the subject from my mind; but soon after I retired, I felt the usual mesmerising, but on thinking of the matter afterwards, it seemed so unlikely that I thought I must be mistaken. On Miss Peele returning to town, I said nothing of this to her, but she told me that on the Wednesday evening she had forgotten to mesmerise me at the usual hour, but that while in bed this omission suddenly flashed upon her mind, and she at once got up and made the usual mesmeric passes, accompanied, of course, as on every occasion, with a strong effort of the will. I may say, incidentally, that this is not the only occasion on which I have been mesmerised from a distance, though never before from so great a distance as this, of 105 miles. To those who ask the cul bono of Spiritualism, or who question the beneficence of the spiritual agency at work, I reply, not by verbal argument, but by these and like facts of personal experience—experience which I hope may be shared by many other sufferers.—Yours, &c.,

ELMA SHORTER.

P.S.—To prevent misunderstanding, it may be advisable to state that the co-operation of Miss Peele's spirit physician is strictly limited to assistance in the actual work of healing.

A Wonderful Phenomenon.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Although to a Spiritualist there is scarcely anything in the way of phenomena apt to surprise him, yet what I am going to relate is so extraordinary, that even the most experienced amongst us must marvel.

A gentleman whose name I am not at liberty to mention, but who moves in the highest circles of society, has shown to myself and to a few confirmed Spiritualists a plaster cast taken from the corpse of a man I have known in the form, but whose name I have promised never to reveal on account of the reluctance his family might feel, but well known in this country as a distinguished author and lecturer. On this cast hair is growing on the head, the eyebrows, and beard. Let me be clear. It is not the plaster that grows, but a tolerably thick crop of natural hair. Of course some great luminary of science who knows that the thing cannot be, has tried to explain the fact with a "you see, in drawing the mould from the face and head, the hair stuck to the plaster, and was then transferred to the cast where it now appears." But the gentleman to whom the cast belongs assures me that he had the hair plucked out of it, and, to the great chagrin of Professor Protoplasterer, in a short time, it grew again!

As, however, there is nothing new under the sun, there exists in the Cathedral of St. Stephen, in Vienna, a natural-sized wooden crucifix black with age, and from which the growing hair and nails are cut every year by the bishop that be, and given as relics to the faithful. Being then a Comtist I smiled at the trick and credulity; now I could not with grace disbelieve.—Respectfully yours,

G. DAMIANI.

A Perplexing Experience.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I have read with interest the pamphlet, "How to Investigate Spiritualism," and have always, for some reason or other, been interested in the subject; I therefore venture to trouble you for advice and information under the following circumstances:—

At the instigation of a chance strange acquaintance some time ago I commenced trying to write with a Planchette, and soon succeeded in making marks which I interpreted into a message, which message was again and again repeated with but little variation. On the recommendation of a friend I discarded Planchette and wrote with pencil and paper alone, but nearly always with the same result, i.e., the single message.

Now I have been at this off and on some six months or more, and am yet still unable to definitely and for long decide if I am the victim of "unconscious cerebration," "expectant attention," involuntary "action of the muscles," or any other scientific modes of expressing that one has made a fool of oneself. But the strangest part is to come; when with a view of convincing myself I question the supposed "intelligence," and object to the message on many grounds and also doubt the friendliness and goodness of the supposed external agency, I am subjected to very violent movements of the hand and arm which frequently break the thick point of the pencil and tear the paper.

As a solution to this:—

Now as directly I begin to object and argue with the external (if any) or my own (unrecognised) agency, I have already conceived in my own mind the possible and natural result, viz., that the agency would be annoyed, it is not surprising (under the hypothesis that I am befooled myself) that I should get this displeased and indignant motion, as I construe it.

A friend of mine, who writes freely and always in a high moral tone, at my request asked of his "spirit" (?) why I am thus used, and has always been answered, in the highly complimentary manner (to me), that I am under "hellish influences" or it is "the devil," &c.

And when I further wish to be informed why, I am told my scepticism is the cause, and that I need faith, prayer, and purity, to remove the evil spirits by which I am surrounded.

As the whole matter, to my mind, is one in which only personal proof will carry conviction to an inquirer, how in reason can scepticism be a cause of want of power to prove the truth of the phenomena? If one were not sceptical, one surely would not inquire?

Can you help me to understand what to me is at present dark, or give me any hints that will be of any use to me, to get the unseen or myself into a rational state?—I am, yours faithfully,

E.D.

P.S.—I should have mentioned that my "spirit" signs "Meno," my friend's "Lizzie," and that vide my friend's familiar, I am under the guidance of Sheneli (?), which means "scepticism;" that a friend of mine is under Cigmir (?), signifying "height and purity of purpose;" that my friend is under "Zanta" (?), "bright light," and his friend is under "Copa," which in "human thought" means, as near as "Lizzie" can give us, "the same as the emblem of joy"—all of which is not very intelligible to me.

A Query.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Can you or your readers inform me if the following is a correct quotation from p. 10 of "Natural Religion v. Revealed Religion," by Mrs. Besant:—"I believe in life everlasting. We do not pretend to know anything about it: it is a hope and a trust, not an absolute knowledge. We entertain a reasonable hope of immortality. We argue its likelihood from considerations of the justice and love which, as we believe, rule the universe. We many of us—as I freely confess I do myself—believe in it with a firmness of conviction absolutely immovable."—Yours,

WALTER MELLON.

"Koot Hoomi."

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—The letter of W. T. Brown, F.T.S., Bachelor Legis, dated Madras, October 8th, 1883, and published in your issue of the 10th inst., calls for some comment from me, on account of the singularly incorrect and illogical view it takes of my position in regard to the Sinnett and Buddhistic controversy.

I made no "accusation of plagiarism" in calling attention to the parallel passages found in one of Koot Hoomi's "occult" letters and a discourse of mine of previous date. I simply asked for an explanation. It was, indeed, a great compliment to be quoted (even without the usual marks) by so profound a sage—so great that I almost doubted the existence of the sage. Hence, I desired that existence proved; and I have waited more than three months, anxiously expecting the occult problem to be solved.

But how has it been solved? Mr. Sinnett pleads ignorance; but thinks the question "trivial." Mr. Brown, however, says conjecturally, "Our master has, no doubt, seen the idea [how about the words?] and being tired has written or impressed it hurriedly without regard to the feelings of Mr. Kiddle on the one hand or Plato on the other." Beautiful childlike faith! But does this satisfy the keen intellect of an occultist? If the master was too "tired" to avoid copying without quotation prints, how is it that his mind was so active in adapting the passage to Occultism, while it was meant for Spiritualism? And why did he interject the remark about Plato, attributing to that ancient philosopher what he was copying from my address? I humbly request Mr. Sinnett, Mr. Brown, or Koot Hoomi himself, to shew me by definite citation that the passage referred to was written by Plato. I certainly did not translate it from any of his works. This seems to be an attempt to change the issue by asserting, without any proof, that the real author of the passage in question is Plato. Perhaps he is, but I ask the proof. Then we shall see what the "feelings of Plato" have to do with the matter. As to myself, it is not at all a matter of feeling but of truth. This is what I wrote to obtain; but it is very "occult," I am told; "it deals with an essence known as 'astral light.'" Oh! And then I am somewhat impudently (not pertinently, I mean) informed that "the absence of knowledge on the part of Mr. Kiddle is assuredly his loss." Yes, but when I find my property in the possession of another person, it seems like adding insult to injury to be told, "You are an ignorant fellow, else you would know where and how I got it, and that you have no rightful claim to it. Don't charge me with stealing, but look to my friend and accomplice Astral Light."

Mr. Sinnett may look at this matter as "trivial," and per se perhaps it is; but let me remind him that the question, "Is Koot Hoomi a myth?" has not been answered yet, and consequently the authority for "Esoteric Buddhism," and its singular theories and statements is still extremely shadowy.

If the "masters of Occultism" are striving to enlighten the world, they will be willing rather to remove the very natural scepticism that exists than to "quietly laugh" at it, as Mr. Brown puts it; unless to the occult mind a laugh is equivalent to an argument. If the "accepted chelas" know the "Brothers" as they "know their own souls," their testimony would be singularly interesting, if not conclusive.

HENRY KIDDLE.

New York,
November 21st, 1883.

[By inserting Mr. Kiddle's final reply we must not be understood as encouraging further discussion. We will note facts in connection with this subject if any are brought to our notice.—Ed. "LIGHT."]

Miss Corner's Mission Work.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—May I inform your readers that I have secured the Memorial Hall, Bethnal Green, for the occasion of my children's treat, January 10th, 1884? All who would wish their names to appear on my list of friends and supporters must kindly send in before Christmas, as a list will be published with each copy of the book, "Rhineland," the entire proceeds of which will be devoted to charitable purposes.

PATRONS AND SUPPORTERS.—Baroness Von Vay, The Lady Helena Newenham, Countess Waldeck, Countess Spireti, Countess Nina Wurmbbrand, Sir Wm. Topham, Bart., Sir Chas. Isham, Bart., Right Hon. Henry Fawcett, M.P., John Holmes, Esq., M.P., Arthur Pease, Esq., M.P., Wm. Crookes, Esq., F.R.S., Captain James, Hensleigh Wedgwood, Esq., J.P., Alderman Peckett, J.P., Edward Corner, J.P., C. C. Massey, Esq., Dr. Wyld, Dr. Corner, &c., &c.

CAROLINE CORNER.

3, St. Thomas's-square, Hackney.

A FACILITY of disposition, and delicacy of feeling, when exposed to a frequent contact with the ungenerous, is one of the most serious misfortunes that can befall humanity. A person so constituted is obliged to endure a thousand affronts; and if, by any means, he is roused to resentment, he is called irritable—for no other reason, but because he is uniformly expected to be submissive.

THE INITIATE.

Slowly, with day's dying fall,
And with many a solemn sound,
Slowly from the Athenian wall
The long procession wound.

Five days of the mystic nine,
Clad in solemn thought, were past,
Ere the few could drink the wine,
Or seek the height at last.

Then the chosen, young and old,
To Eleusis went their ways;
But no lip the tale has told
Of those mysterious days.

In the seer's seeing eye—
The maiden with a faithful soul,
In youth that did not fear to die—
Was felt that strange control.

Yet no voice the dreadful word,
Through these centuries of man,
Made the sacred secret heard,
Or shewed the hidden plan.

All the horrors born of death
Rose within that nine days' gloom,
Chasing those forms of mortal breath
From awful room to room.

Deep through bowels of the earth
They drove the seekers of the dark,
Hearts that longed to know the worth
Hid in the living spark.

In that moment of despair
Was revealed—but who may tell
How the Omnipotent declares
His truth that all is well?

Saw they forms of their own lost?
Heard they voices that have fled?
We know not—or know at most
Their joy was no more dead.

Light of resurrection gleamed,
But in what shape we cannot hear,
Glory shone of the redeemed
Beyond this world of fear.

Old books say Demeter came
And smiled upon them, and her smile
Burned all their sorrow in its flame,

O shadowed sphere whereon we pause
To live our dream and suffer, thou
Shroudest the initiate days; the cause
Gleams on thy morning brow!

MR. D. D. HOME.—Full-length portrait of Mr. Home, painted by Pickersgill, R.A., for sale. Apply to Editor of "LIGHT," 38, Great Russell-street, Bloomsbury, W.C.

THE C.A.S.—A meeting of the Council of the C.A.S. will be held at 38, Great Russell-street, on Tuesday next, at 6.30 p.m., to receive the report of the committee recently appointed to carry out the resolution for bringing the Association to a close.

A GOOD TEST MANIFESTATION.—The Spiritual Record for December gives the following:—"Mr. Blackburn, one of the shrewdest, most persevering, and most self-sacrificing of Spiritual investigators, had a good test one night with Mr. Eglinton at Dr. Nichols's. Sitting next his daughter, in the light, they had a small work-box between them on the table. After examining the box, Mr. Blackburn placed in it a blank card, and then, instead of a bit of pencil, a pocket knife, which he borrowed of Dr. Nichols. Then he asked the spirits, instead of writing or drawing on the card, to cut out of it a geometrical figure, such as his daughter should choose. They placed their hands on the cover of the box, so as to make access to it 'impossible,' and she asked that the figure might be a hexagon, a figure with six equal sides, so cleverly made by the bees in honeycomb. In a few seconds they opened the box, and found in the centre of the card a hexagon accurately cut, but kept in its place by two slightly adhering corners."

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M.A. (Oxon.)"

In "LIGHT" (November 17th ult.) some details were recently given of what has become known as "The Shropshire Mystery." There is, in effect, no great mystery about this story of powerful physical mediumship; but the newspapers have made a wonder of it, and the illiterate and uneducated people of the neighbourhood have magnified reports until it becomes very difficult to know how much is to be believed. It seems clear that the girl, Emma Davies, is a medium, and that various phenomena, familiar to Spiritualists, occur in her presence. The invisible agency is destructive, mischievous, and indulges in the rough horse-play characteristic of the Poltergeist. There is absolutely nothing in the accounts given, making due allowance for exaggeration, that differentiates this case from others duly authenticated in days past. But a fiercer light beats upon these matters now, and it is not surprising that the London newspapers should see a possible opportunity for some spicy paragraphs. One of them sent down a representative, selected apparently from the possession of a purely negative qualification. He knew nothing about Spiritualism, but he did know that nothing of the kind had ever taken place in his presence. He had always felt able to dispose of ghosts and psychical phenomena as mere hallucinations of a weak or diseased mind. And so he went off with a light heart to dispose of this new imposture. In due course there appeared in the journal which he represented an account of a confession made by the girl that she had imposed on the credulity of these simple country-folk, and had done by natural means what they regarded as supernatural occurrences. The newspapers rejoiced, for they are half afraid of Spiritualism, and wholly hate what they instinctively fear. And so the matter dropped.

But not for long. From the Wellington Journal and Shrewsbury News of November 24th ult., I see that the phenomena have broken out with renewed vehemence. From the account, which is as poor and flippant as can well be conceived, and which I quote, therefore, with much reservation, it appears that the girl when sitting on a chair was raised, together with the chair, a foot from the floor. It is not easy to see how she could have effected this by natural means. Various other phenomena are recorded; and a statement of the girl's is published which throws some light on the fair and honourable methods by which the newspaper reporters and doctors extracted from her the so-called confession which has so solaced the London journals. These "doctors, newspaper men, &c." (no newspapers are referred to specifically), are charged in this statement with frightening, intimidating, and even striking this poor girl in order to overawe her into saying what they wished. One interviewer represented himself as a police constable, and threatened her with the gaol if she did not tell how the thing was done. They bribed a fellow-servant to worm out the secret. One crafty reporter resorted to the time-honoured plan of making love to the poor girl to get at the truth. The whole story is as pitiful as can be conceived. Whether wholly or partially true it is not pleasant reading, and suggests with startling force the shifts that men of education and position will resort to in order to crush what they detest. The London reporter, of course, neither kissed nor "smacked" this little servant-girl; but, by his own confession, he went down with no qualification but a strong belief that these things never occurred at all, and he found what he carried with him in his own strongly prejudiced mind. The local journal, which prints the statement of the girl, winds up by saying, "The child must be a most accomplished actress!" "The pitiful fact becomes evident that the popular superstition is only too plainly increasing."

Though I by no means attach importance to the ipsissima verba of an illiterate girl recorded by a scarcely less illiterate reporter, who suffers from a belief that it is his duty to be funny, I think the statement important enough to be placed on record, and therefore quote it from the journal to which I have referred. It seems to me that this is a case which should be carefully looked into by some experienced member of the Psychical Society. To remove the girl from her environment, and bring her to London would be probably to paralyse the manifestations for a time at any rate. The whole matter should be patiently investigated on the spot by some qualified observer. The statement of the girl is as follows:—

"They fetched a bucket, and shook me, and smacked me. 'Chuck it high over head,' and because I did not throw it high enough they made me do it again. They asked me how these things were done, and I told them I didn't know. They said yes, I did know, and that I should have to tell them, and said what they would do. I told them something. I don't know what I said because they smacked me. I was frightened and told them that I did it. I really don't know how to do them. When anything has happened I haven't known about it till I have seen it. I don't know how the thing is done. I can't move that brush or table or anything else without catching hold of it. (This was said with a smile.) One man said he was a police-constable, and he should take me to gaol if I did not tell him. I thought he was a police-constable. He was in plain clothes. I was frightened into saying what I said. Of course what I told him was not true. I was frightened into it. I can't account for the things in any way. I feel frightened after they have been done. Dr. Corke gave me a shilling, and said it was 'to keep the devil off.' I don't know how the things happen. I want them stopped. They upset me. The one who said he was a policeman asked me how to make the knife fly off the table. They tried to make me do something with the knife, but I wouldn't; they locked the doors to keep me in. They followed me all about the house. They gave the other girl something to ask me to shew them how to do the knife trick. I never saw it till they shewed me. (A smile.) One slapped my hands and held them behind my back. The others said it was too bad. I did no tricks with the knife or anything else. I couldn't. A chair, and a thing they hang clothes on, a clothes horse, moved about, and a pair of slippers went from the hearth on to the sofa. Miss Turner did not see it, but she was trying to do it herself. I cannot tell you how the things are done, nor anything about it. Dr. Corke was very kind. He said he should tell mother he thought I was tricky. Dr. Mackay was also very kind. More things happened at home than at Wem. I can't account for it. While I was there the housekeeper's dress flew off the bed. Jane was there then, and she said she would not stop if I did. One of the reporters asked me to kiss him before he went. I wouldn't, but (smiling) he kissed me. When I was washing my hands in the yard the bucket moved. They said I did it, but Dr. Corke's boy, who was in the yard, said I didn't touch it. I've had nothing to do with these things at all."

The Spectator (November 24th ult.) has a very fair review of the Lourdes cures, of which an account has been recently published by M. Henri Lasserre. This gentleman had been recommended to try the Lourdes water by M. de Freycinet a Protestant, and since then Prime Minister of France. In September, 1862, M. Lasserre had so far lost his eyesight (from hypertrophy of the optic nerve) that "he could not read three or four lines of the largest print without an excessive fatigue in the upper part of the eyes, which rendered it quite impossible for him to continue." It was when he had been deprived of his sight for all reading purposes for nearly three months, that M. de Freycinet urged him to try Lourdes. M. Lasserre was unwilling; not that he feared failure, but success. The responsibility is tremendous (he said in effect); with a doctor, the fee would quit me; but if God cures me, I must give up all in the world, and lead a saintly life. M. de Freycinet, however, overcame his scruples, and himself wrote to the curé of Lourdes for a bottle of water for his friend's use. The letter was signed by M. Lasserre, and a photograph of it is given in his book. "The cure was sudden and complete, though there was some threat of a relapse, which M. Lasserre ascribed to a conscious moral failure of his own, following directly on the cure—a threat of relapse which was averted, as he believes, by the prayers of M. Dupont, and his own penitence. Twenty years have elapsed and M. Lasserre, who has become the historian of the Lourdes wonders, has never found his eyesight fail him again."

That is, in itself, a strong case, and the testimony is unimpeachable. But physicians would, I presume, refer the cure to the stimulating effect of faith acting on a nervous disease. But the following case cannot be included in any such category:—A carpenter of Lavaur (a town some forty miles from Toulouse) was cured of an exceedingly aggravated disease (varicose veins) of thirty years' standing. First of all, to establish the reality of the case, three elaborate certificates are given from two local physicians, and from Dr. Bennet, of the Faculty of Paris. They are too long for citation, but I give the comparatively brief one of his regular attendant:—

"I, the undersigned, declare that for about thirty years Mr. Francis Macary, carpenter, has been suffering from varicose veins in the legs. These varicose veins, which were of the thickness of a finger, and complicated with de cordons noueux et flexueux très-développés, compelled him to wear up to the present time a regular compression (une compression méthodique), exerted partly by means of twisted bandages, partly by means of dog-skin stockings. In spite of these precautions, ulcers frequently shewed themselves on both legs, and, whenever they did, compelled complete repose and a long course of treatment. I have visited him to-day, and although his under limbs were stripped of all clothing, I have only been able to discover a few traces of these enormous varicose veins. This case of spontaneous cure appears to me all the more surprising, that the annals of science record not a single fact of this nature. — (Signed), SEOUR, Doctor of Medicine, Member of the Mutual Aid Society of Saint Louis, Lavaur, August 16th, 1871."

Dr. Bennet's testimony is far more minute; and none of the physicians conceal their astonishment at this cure of a man of sixty, whose disease, of thirty years' standing, was of such an aggravated character. Nor can they in any way explain what they nevertheless attest.

Society journals reflect, in a certain way, the floating opinion of what in London passes for fashionable life. It is so far interesting, therefore, to find the World concerning itself with what it calls "The New Religion." "Aestheticism is becoming obsolete, and the new gospel of Buddhism is rapidly supplementing it in drawing-rooms and boudoirs." "The modern Leuconœ," it seems, "reads 'Isis Unveiled,' and fervently accepts the new revelation, according to Mr. Sinnett and Madame Blavatsky. . . . Few male worshippers are associated with her in the new religion, and these few are of the weak-kneed race. . . . The new religion is essentially feminine. . . . The air is heavy with aspiration (sic), ghostly forms sweep round the threshold, and the astral body of Madame Blavatsky stands within before the vision of the sacred Lotus." And so forth. The stuff is poor enough, and the writer is ignorant of what he (or is it she?) deals with. The fact is that some very powerful and robust intellects have been and are influenced by this new religion. The dealing at all with the subject in a society journal is the only point worth noting, unless I except the admission that "literature and conversation witness on all sides to a decay in the general conviction of immortality." This note of the age is beginning to strike even observers so superficially flippant as the writer in the World. What he calls "the preposterous imposture," which he fails to understand or appreciate, is not the only answer to this craving for new spiritual food.

Mr. im Thurn, an Oxford graduate (I wonder of what nationality), recently appointed a special magistrate among the Indians of the Pomeroon River, has gathered together and published* a vast amount of information about the Indians of Guiana. A reviewer in the St. James's Gazette, who is apparently not well informed as to the subject of Spiritualism or Thought-reading, which he seems to regard on synonymous terms, thus comments on a very interesting part of the book. It is easy to ignore his preconceived ideas and to recognise among these primitive people the presence of what is ubiquitous and protean in its manifestations.

"Every one who has been in British Guiana has heard of the Kenaimas, human and spiritual powers of evil, who are the bane and terror of the Indian's existence. To counteract the malefic influence of the Kenaimas, each larger Indian village keeps its peaiman or medicine-man. One of Mr. im Thurn's most interesting adventures was that in which he placed himself in the hands of a peaiman, who undertook to cure him of a headache, and who, to judge from the author's description, had in him the making of an admirable Spiritualist professor or of a thought-reader. Mr. im Thurn submitted for six long hours, in a hut on the savannah, to the process of 'peai-ing.' By ventriloquism were produced the most terrible noises, and an extremely clever imitation of the animals of Guiana in whose bodies the Kenaimas who had bestowed the headache were supposed to lurk. The patient describes himself as being all the while in a sort of mesmeric trance, feeling at times the air driven over his face, 'as if some big-winged thing came from afar toward the house, passed through the roof, and then settled heavily on the floor; and again, after an interval as if the same winged thing rose and passed away as it had come.' It was interesting, even wonderful; but he was not cured. He rushed at last into the open savannah and 'a wild and pitch-dark night; and, 'bare-headed, bare-footed, and coatless,' with the lightning flashing now and then behind the distant mountains, waited for the dawn. The peaiman insisted that a cure had been effected, and demanded payment; and as he produced in proof the kenaima, a caterpillar which had been extracted from Mr. im Thurn's body, his fee, 'a looking-glass which had cost four-pence,' could not be denied. Concerning the folk-lore of the Indians it is somewhat difficult to come to any certain conclusion; for there can be little doubt that it has been mixed with stories told by white men. The chapter on Animism—that is to say, the assumption of the Indian that there is a soul in everything, from the bird overhead to the weirdly-shaped stone by some waterfall—is very entertaining and suggestive. To the Indian, dreams and visions are realities. 'To him, dream-acts and working-acts differ only in one respect—namely, that the former are done only by the spirit; the latter are done by the spirit in its body.' Consequently, if an Indian dreams he has been ill-treated by any one, it is an injury that actually occurred, and has to be avenged accordingly; for the vendetta is the police of the Indian's world. This dream-life is a source of much that is ludicrous, and also of a good deal that is tragic, as may readily be imagined."

* "Among the Indians of Guiana." By Everard im Thurn. (Kegan Paul and Co., 1883.)

INSTANCE OF DOUBLE-CONSCIOUSNESS IN DREAMS.

THE SLEEPING MUSICIAN.

(From article on Dreams in "The Occult Sciences," by the late Elihu Rich.)

"It was observed by the ancients that a certain class of dream occurs in the transition between sleep and waking, but they were far from supposing that this discovery explained the mystery of dreaming in general.

"Such an opinion, however, has obtained currency, chiefly, we believe, on the authority of Lord Brougham, and it forms a part of that sensational philosophy which recognises in sleep nothing more than the repose of organisation. . . . So far from the notion of Lord Brougham and his followers being true, the very reverse is the fact. The more profoundly we sleep the more perfectly we dream, for the degree in which the spirit is remitted into freedom, and into the exercise of its proper faculties, is proportionate to its separation from the body; or if the body remain active (as in some states of clairvoyance), to its distinct consciousness. In proof of this distinct consciousness, how often do we suddenly remember having dreamed, though previously the night had appeared to us a perfect blank. Frequently the dreamer awakes at the instant when a whole train of circumstances or a scene vanishes, not by a decay of memory or deficiency of impression, but in all the vividness of life, and as instantly as if a door were closed against him which opened into another world. In such cases no volition can recover the momentary glance that alone seems necessary to restore the vision. Children, also, wake up in excitement often immediately after talking in their sleep, and yet, however closely questioned, they have no recollection of having dreamed. Beyond these significant facts there are certain vague impressions of another field of memory, the objects of which seem to float in some indistinct shadowy outline before the mind's eye, and every instant we expect these impenetrable little mysteries to blossom into life, until expectation may, under peculiar circumstances, become agony. There are feelings that nearly all must have experienced, and the inference we draw from them is, not that volition ever ceases, but that the objects that occupy it are not always impressed upon the material memory. In other words, that the memory, so far from being one distinct organ, is the activity of all the faculties, which activity is resolvable into two or more distinct states of consciousness.

"The double consciousness is recognised by Dr. Moore in his 'Power of the Soul over the Body.' He cites a few cases from Pritchard, Abercrombie, and others. The following instance, abbreviated from the account of Dr. Abercrombie, is most interesting:—'A girl, seven years of age, employed in tending cattle, was accustomed to sleep in an apartment next to one which was frequently occupied by an itinerant fiddler, who was a musician of considerable skill, and who spent a part of the night in performing pieces of a refined description. These performances were noticed by the child only as disagreeable noises. After residing in this house she fell into bad health, and was removed by a benevolent lady to her own home, where, on her recovery, she was employed as a servant. Some years after she came to reside with this lady, the wonder of the family was strongly excited by hearing the most beautiful music during the night, especially as they spent many waking hours in vain endeavours to discover the invisible musician. At length the sound was traced to the sleeping room of the girl, who was fast asleep, but uttering from her lips sounds exactly resembling those from a small violin. On further observation, it was discovered that after being about two hours in bed she became restless, and began to mutter to herself. She then uttered tones precisely like the tuning of a violin, and at length, after some prelude, dashed off into elaborate pieces of music, which she performed in a clear and accurate manner, and with a sound not to be distinguished from the most delicate modulations of that instrument. During the performance, she sometimes stopped, imitated the re-tuning of her instrument, and then recommenced exactly where she had stopped, in the most correct manner. These paroxysms occurred at irregular intervals, varying from one to fourteen or even twenty nights, and they were generally followed by a degree of fever. After a year or two, her music was not confined to the imitation of the violin, but was often exchanged for that of the piano, which she was accustomed to hear in the house in which she now lived; and she then began to sing, imitating exactly the voices of several of the family. In another year from this time she began to talk much in her sleep, in which she seemed to fancy herself instructing a younger companion. She often descanted with the utmost fluency and correctness on a variety of topics, both political and religious, of the news of the day, the historical parts of Scripture, of public characters, of members of the family, and of their visitors. In these discussions she shewed the most wonderful discrimination, often combined with sarcasm, and astonishing powers of memory. She was fond of illustrating her subjects by what she called a fable, and in these her imagery was both appropriate and elegant. She has been known to conjugate correctly Latin verbs, which she had probably heard in the school-room of the family, and she was once heard to speak several sentences correctly in French, at the same time stating that she heard them from a foreign gentleman, but could not repeat a word of what he said. During her paroxysms it was almost impossible to awaken her, and when her eyelids were raised and a candle brought near her eye, the pupil seemed insensible to the light' (Chap. x., pp. 220-223.) Corroborative facts may be found in most works which treat of mental philosophy or physiology connected with mental states."

Take from the Bible what is termed miraculous or supernatural, and you have nothing but history left. Spiritualism shews how all this is possible, through natural laws, and gives a reason for everything; so that no more is it supernatural, but rational and tangible to our senses. To know that death is but a change—a vacating of the old home of the soul, for a new and spiritual one; a leaving the old chrysalis state to emerge a bright and radiant being in the natural element of the spirit, is a joy unspeakable to mortals here below. It is not death, but life; not destruction, but a new birth into a changed condition of existence—an immortal one, with glorious possibilities of growth toward the Infinite, of which we, as children of our Heavenly Father, are an epitome creation, made and fashioned in His own image.—Mizpah, in Saratoga (N. # "WHO ARE OUR SPIRITUAL ENEMIES?"

V.

Very significantly does Böhme say in his "Aurora," to which I must refer the student for copious (and to a patient mind fairly intelligible) teaching about Lucifer, "In his pride he smote himself with darkness and blindness, and made himself a devil. He knew in God only the majesty and not the Word in the centre. He would needs inflame himself and rule in the fire over the meekness." ("Aurora," chap. 15, par. 12.) To the present hour how incessantly we make the same mistake! The dignity of pride, the superb stateliness of indignation, the forceful bluster of wrath, how much stronger and more availing they feel to every angry human heart! It knows the majesty, i.e., the might of the kindled aching forms of nature, but not "the Word in the centre," the meek light of love escaping from the fire, and shining far beyond the lurid prison where only wrath and pain can be generated, and never the waters of eternal life and the imperishable substance which it forms. The forces of Eternal Nature are mighty, but to the Word in the centre alone was all power given in Heaven and in earth.

In the 1st book of Kings, chap. 19, the agency of the powers of Divine Nature, as contrasted with that of the Word of God, is marked emphatically. We read there that "The Lord passed by, and a great and strong wind rent the mountains, and broke in pieces the rocks before the Lord, but the Lord was not in the wind, and after the wind an earthquake, but the Lord was not in the earthquake, and after the earthquake a fire, but the Lord was not in the fire, and after the fire a still small voice." To this the negative is not added, and we are led to suppose that the God of Israel was in that voice made known. Again, when the disciples of Jesus proposed to bring fire from Heaven to punish the Samaritans, His gentle monition, "Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of," suggests Divine knowledge of the evil source of a wish for exercising resistant power even with good intentions. "The devil sought great strength and power, as also the present world doth great might and honour and despiseth the light of love" ("Third Great Point," chap. 4, par. 31), and until Jesus Christ came to this earth and shewed the majesty of humble self-sacrifice, the power of meekness was unknown, and to this day so contrary is it to our natural ideas of greatness that very generally it is mistaken for defect of force.

"Learn of Me for I am meek and lowly of heart" was the new and wonderful teaching of Him Who gave for His last and all-embracing commandment, "Love one another." And now we know that "in love and meekness we become new-born out of the anger of God; in love and meekness we must strive and fight" . . . "for love is the devil's poison, it is a fire of terror to him wherein he cannot stay." (Second part of "Treatise on Incarnation," chap. 7, pars 44, 45.) "Therefore it is that Christ so earnestly teacheth us love, humility, and mercifulness; and the cause why God is become man is for our salvation and happiness sake, that we should not turn back from His love." ("Threefold Life," chap. 14, par. 71.) In this passage the connection of ideas is not evident until we remember the office of imagination in re-moulding the attitude, and hence the "spirit of the soul;" for, "mark this, every imagination maketh an essence." ("A Warning from J.B.," par. 2.) To say nothing here of the far less comprehensible effects of the Word taking flesh upon Him, we can easily see how much a fellow creature's example, greatly admired, tells upon the ideal of his admirers, and consequently upon their self-conduct. Jesus Christ gave the human race an absolutely new ideal. His forerunner announced that the Kingdom of Heaven was at hand, but He revealed the more important truth, "the Kingdom of God is within you." Into that Kingdom we enter so soon as we surrender ourselves to meekness and love; "in the love the fire dieth and transmuteth itself into joy." (Apology 3, Text 1, par. 58.) Yes! and therefore is the joy resulting in proportion to the dying of the kindled fire.

But the habitual maintenance of love and meekness is, I suppose, a difficult achievement even to those who are constitutionally placable; to people of irascible nature so extremely difficult as to call for the Biblical proviso, "If it be possible, as much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men." (Rom. xii. 18.) With all men and at all times it is not possible, and for such exceptional cases Böhme gives a recipe which no one will ever try in vain. "If a fire riseth up in one qualifying spirit then that is not concealed from the soul. It may instantly awaken the other qualifying spirits which are contrary to the kindled fire, and may quench it. But if the fire will be, or become, too big, then hath the soul a prison, wherein it may shut up the kindled spirit, viz., in hard astringent quality" (which here I venture to explain to myself as inaction and silence)—"and the other spirits must be the jailers, till wrath be allayed and the fire be extinguished," . . . "but if the spirit breaketh out of prison, then put it in again, make good thy part against it as long as thou livest." ("Aurora," chap. 10, pars. 85, 86, 90.)

I must diverge a little from the main line of this chapter to call attention to the way Böhme here contrasts the power of the seven fountain Spirits with that of the soul, taking for granted its possible supremacy in every conflict. He here identifies the soul and the will; now as elsewhere the soul is spoken of as one with the seven Spirits of Eternal Nature, confusion of thought will result unless we carefully bear in mind that he has shewn that this Eternal Nature was, and is, the consequence of the Abyssal Deity willing to manifest itself: the original of the human soul also was prior to its manifestation, for we are told that God breathed into man the breath of life—a life that must have preceded all nature and creature since it emanated from God, and made man to be in the likeness of God. Hence the much contested free will of man which now fights at such tremendous odds against what we call fate; i.e., the forces of inferior beings raised by his fall, and insubordination to comparatively superior power, nay, in time, and as regards his external life to most undeniable superiority. Yet, notwithstanding all the opposition of the stars and the elements in his outer life, in the life within "all is possible; as soon is the good changed into evil as the evil into good. For every man is free, and is as a God to himself, he may change or alter himself in this life either into wrath or into light." ("Aurora," chap. 18, pars 42, 43.)

An assertion that many will contradict, but one that should be taken as bearing upon the generality of human beings; not those who by long continued indulgence of lowest instincts have lost, or by the hereditary penalties of ancestral vice have hardly ever attained, consciousness of their human birth-right.

In one short sentence Böhme sums up what is in the power of every human being whose spiritual degradation is not yet complete. "Man hath the death in him, whereby he may die unto the evil." ("Signatura Rerum," chap. 16, par. 28.)

Incapable as the deeply corrupted may be of doing or feeling anything right, ceasing to do evil remains possible, and when this—the whole of man's share in working out his own salvation—is persisted in, the Divine spirit begins and carries on the new creation of regenerate life. This habitual death to the instigations of the divided properties or forms of nature in us, is the indispensable condition of any true life. "The curse of God" (i.e., the withdrawal of God's holiness—wholeness of action) "is come into the seven forms so that they are in strife and enmity, and one form doth annoy the other, and can never agree unless they all seven enter into death and die unto the self-will. Now, this cannot be except a death come into them, which breaks all their will; as the Deity in Christ was a death to the human selfhood." (Ibid, chap. 12, par. 30.)

And had not Jesus Christ broken the rebellious will of the human selfhood in a true human soul, this death had not been possible to us: "For the soul having sprung out of the Eternal source, and having its originality out of the eternity, none can redeem it in its own root of eternity, or bring it out of the anger, except there come one who is love itself and be born in its own very birth, that so he may bring it out of the anger and set it in the love in himself, as it was done in Christ." . . . "We know very exactly that we could not be redeemed except the Deity did go into the soul, and bring forth the will of the soul again out of the fierceness in itself, into the light of the meekness; for the root of life must remain or else the whole creature must be dissolved." ("Three Principles," chap. 25, pars. 6, 8.)

AN ANCESTRAL GHOST.

The following singular story was related to the writer in 1865 by a gentleman who shall be called Major Hammond.

He was born, he said, in an ancient house in one of the Midland counties, a curious place which for many generations had been in the possession of his family. It had originally been surrounded by a moat, which possessed the reputation of being haunted. The story of the haunting was current amongst the country folk; nevertheless my informant, as child and youth, had heard no description of the ghost. "In fact I did not in those years," he said, "give credit to such tales." During his boyhood the moat was filled up. When the water was drawn off, the workmen came upon a strange thing lying in its bottom, namely, a log of wood, rudely carved, and chained to stakes firmly planted in the mud. As soon as the workmen came upon this thing they, in great confusion, rushed from the spot. They had come upon the ghost's effigy chained and "laid" by seven clergymen, according to the prescribed formula of exorcism and "ghost laying." No one, at first, dared to touch or to remove this effigy from its chains, lest once more the ghost should "walk."

The father of the Major, from home at the time of the discovery, upon his return forthwith ordered it to be removed. The informant well remembers that the uncouth log lay disregarded afterwards for years, in an outhouse.

Time passed on, and the ghost was no more talked about. One night, however, the Major, then grown into a young man, whilst on a visit at home, dreamed a most vivid and frightful dream. The impression was so strong and disagreeable that he found it impossible to again fall asleep. What with the horror which he had passed through and his sleepless night, when he appeared at the breakfast table his countenance betrayed that something was grievously amiss with him. His mother anxiously demanded an explanation from her son.

"It was only a dream, mother," he replied; "never mind it."

The mother, however, not easily satisfied, pressed the youth again so earnestly for an explanation that, at length, he told her what had been his "vision of the night."

In his dream he had seen a relative, lately deceased, whose death had been caused in a frightful manner, and whose life, unhappily, had been one of violence and dissipation. He beheld the deceased precisely as when still upon earth, only with a countenance expressive of direst misery. The expression of anguish of mind was such that once beheld it could never be forgotten. Beside the dead man stood a lady clothed in a long white garment of most peculiar fashion. Her tawny-coloured hair hung in heavy, loose, trailing masses around her, nearly to her feet. Her face was beautiful, but sad and stern; a countenance to turn the on-looker almost to stone, as if she herself had been Medusa. Her keen, pitiless blue eyes were fixed upon her companion in unflinching gaze, as if conveying to him an unspoken judgment. With her right hand she repeatedly struck him with a switch. This lady had no left arm; it was cut off at the shoulder, leaving only the stump.

No sooner had the son described the left arm as being wanting, than the mother exclaimed with terror, "You saw, then, the White Lady, the ghost of the family! Some misfortune surely must be about to happen!"

The youth in his dream had thus beheld the ghost, said to have haunted the house in former generations, and the effigy of whom he had seen raised out of the moat! No misfortune, however, so far as he remembered, appeared to have followed upon his sight of her in this dream. But the dream itself left behind it an indelible impression. The idea remained ever with him, that this ancestress of the family, herself in a state of purgation, was made, by an irresistible decree, the agent of purgatorial suffering for her descendants. Possibly the vision of the stern, avenging spirit had been granted to the young man as a salutary lesson for future guidance.

THE PHENOMENA OF SPIRITUALISM: CONCESSIONS TO SCEPTICS AND POSTULATA.

"CONCESSIONS TO SCEPTICS."

"I grant of the facts affirmed to be real, many are very strange, uncouth, and improbable; and that we cannot understand them or reconcile them with the commonly received notions of spirits and the future state.

"I allow that there are many over-credulous persons; and that frauds, impostures, and delusions have been mixed up and confounded with real facts in Spiritualism.

"I grant that melancholy and imagination have very great force, and beget strange persuasions; and that many stories of apparitions have been but melancholy fancies.

"I know and yield that there are many strange natural diseases that have odd symptoms, and produce astonishing effects beyond the usual course of nature; and that these are sometimes quoted as explaining preternatural facts.

"POSTULATA."

"Having made these concessions, the postulata which I demand of my adversaries as my just right are:

"That whether our phenomena occur or not is a question of fact, and not of a priori reasoning.

"That matters of fact can only be proved by immediate sense, or by the testimony of others. To endeavour to demonstrate fact by abstract reasoning or speculation is as if a man should attempt to prove by algebra or metaphysics that Julius Cæsar founded the Empire of Rome.

"A certain amount and character of human testimony cannot be reasonably rejected as incredible, or as supporting facts contrary to nature, since all facts within the realm of nature must be natural.

"That which is sufficiently and undeniably proved ought not to be denied because we know not how it can be; that is because there are difficulties in the conceiving of it; otherwise, sense and knowledge are gone as well as faith. For the modus of most things is unknown, and the most obvious in nature have inextricable difficulties in the conceiving of them."—EPES SARGENT.

A SPIRITUAL ROMANCE, by W. J. Colville, is announced, and "will be, in all essentials, based on actual history: setting forth the leading features of the Spiritual Movement during the last ten years. The relations of Spiritual Truths to the notions of every section of society will be vividly portrayed. The Spiritualists will recognise glimpses of the most prominent workers in the cause, in the actors who appear on the stage thus delineated. All phases of Spiritual Teaching will be introduced, in such a manner that the general reader will be well informed on Spiritualism without intention on his part of such a result."

OF THE

ST. PETERSBURG COMMITTEE ON SPIRITUALISM.

An interesting letter from a Russian Prince (signed Fürst D.K.) appears in the October number of Psychische Studien, calling attention to a recently published work by M. Alexander Aksakow. This book is entitled "The Exposed Intrigue (Die entlarvte Absicht), a history of the scientific investigation of mediumistic phenomena by the Committee of the Physical Society of the University of St. Petersburg." It is another record of the inveterate prejudice and even bad faith so frequently betrayed by the materialists who speak in the name of science, when dealing with facts beyond their intelligence, and fatal to their views. In May, 1875, the Society for Physical Researches in the University of St. Petersburg named twelve of its members, including Professors Mendelejew (chemistry), Petrow (mechanics), Petruschewsky (physics), &c., for the investigation in question. Messrs. Aksakow, Butlerow and Wagner were invited to assist. The Committee met and unanimously agreed to hold forty sittings up to May, 1876, before coming to any decision; and that every report, document, communication, &c., referring to the subject should be imparted to all the sitters. M. Aksakow came to England and, acting on the advice of Mr. Crookes, and 1 other friends in London, engaged the Petty Brothers and Mr. Clayes as mediums for the investigation.

The committee held four sittings in November, 1875, with the Pettys, and four in January, 1876, with Mr. Clayes; and we are told that the phenomena were fully exhibited. Nevertheless, on March 5th, 1876, the committee resolved, contrary to the agreement, to close its sittings. Reports and protocols subsequently issued were not communicated to Messrs. Aksakow, Butlerow, and Wagner, also in contravention of the express condition to which all were parties.

As early as the 15th December, 1875, while the investigation was actually in progress, Professor Mendelejew, who seems to have been the most influential person on the committee, actually called a public meeting to denounce

Spiritualism and mediumship; and on the 20th March, 1876, long, therefore, before the agreed term of investigation and reserve had expired, he obtained the signatures of all the committee (except Aksakow, Butlerow, and Wagner) to a report which is said to have "bristled with errors," and which he forthwith published in the Golos. This report elicited a protest, which appeared in the Moniteur of St. Petersburg, signed by 150 persons belonging to the educated classes in the Metropolis, against the unwarrantable proceedings of Herr Mendelejew.

The latter then published a book entitled "Materials for an Estimate of Spiritualism," in which, adopting a tone of authority, he declared "Spiritualism and mediumship to be quite unworthy of study and serious examination"; "terribly stupid humbug"; "the Spiritists simpletons; and the medium's charlatans," concluding, "Spiritualism darkens the understanding of the persons who occupy themselves with it, confuses their conceptions, and obliterates their intelligence, as I can certify." M. Aksakow has now replied in the book above mentioned, the publication of which has been unavoidably delayed. Prince D. K. describes it as written by a master-hand, in a style attractive and convincing; appealing to documents, and logically yet courteously demonstrating that the Professor's treatment of the subject "is neither scientific nor honourable, and is even contrary to truth." The writer quotes a forcible passage in which M. Aksakow exposes the true character of this pretended judgment, as an attempt to suppress inquiry, and an abuse of the authority of science in the same sense and for the same purpose for which the authority of the Church was abused in past times. The parallel is perfectly just, making due allowance for the diminished resources of intolerance, the spirit of which is precisely the same, whether the dominant preconceptions are those of priests or of exceedingly arrogant men who may, nevertheless, ably and faithfully represent our limited stock of exact physical knowledge. Nor are the means of repression at all dissimilar, save in the inability to persecute in the old-fashioned way. It was not upon the latter method that the power of the Church to retard intellectual advance ever really depended. It was the authority which its judgments commanded in the then state of public opinion that made it really formidable to progress. Now the tables are turned; and the spirit of the priest, passing into the recognised representatives of modern attainments, has at its disposal all the respect and deference transferred from religion to science. And that is a great power.* We did not destroy the effective force of intolerance with the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts.

In the preface to his book, M. Aksakow puts aside all theories, confining himself to facts, and leaving their explanation to follow their recognition. This has been the usual line of writers who address the general public on the subject. It has not been a very successful one. I doubt if a fact out of all relation to either custom or intelligence can be impressed upon the human mind. On the other hand, it is instructive to see the facility with which evidence will be accepted by a theorist. Dr. Carpenter, for instance, admits some phenomena probably true in fact, but individually resting on evidence which would hardly be passed by the Society for Psychical Research. And this is what is really meant by the plausible but fallacious proposition that evidence should be proportionate to probability. When we speak of the probability of a fact we are thinking of its intelligibility. A short time ago, the Saturday Review informed us that science does not concern itself with mysteries; the real question being, of course, whether science has any concern with facts which it is not ready to explain. If not, it is evident that science is either a priori, or is unprogressive. When a mind is so constituted or limited as to be unable either to conceive or to admit an hypothesis adequate to the fact, the latter is violently thrown up by a sort of mental indignation similar to the rejection by the stomach of some unwelcome food. Yet the food may not be noxious, only the stomach weak or diseased. So with the mind. And then this mental incapacity is called the "improbability" of the fact. I have come to doubt very much whether the world will ever be converted by the accumulation and critical presentation of mere evidence (though this is indispensable) without a corresponding advance of psychological conceptions. Of course it may be otherwise if (as seems not impossible) the facts become so obtrusive as to take rank in the stock of notorious experience. In the meantime, what we want quite as much as evidence for the public is a few books of the character of "The Unseen Universe," written by men of established reputation, and familiarising the "educated" classes with conceptions into which the facts will fit.

* For instance, to be identified with a highly discredited belief is often very injurious to a man's prospects in life. My own experience, not very long ago, supplies an illustration. I was at the Bar, and a friend wished to secure for me the business on my circuit of an important firm of solicitors, then unappropriated, owing to a recent legal appointment. I knew nothing about it, till my friend met me one morning, as I was going down to my chambers, with a volley of humorous imprecations. I soon gathered that it was my notorious connection with Spiritualism of which he was complaining. He told me he had actually obtained the promise of employment he sought on my behalf, and was just leaving the office of the solicitors, when he was recalled by the question, "By the bye, there is a man of that name in the profession who goes in for Spiritualism; your man, of course, is not the same?" My friend had reluctantly to admit that indeed he was, and all his assurances that, notwithstanding, I was not an absolute fool, could not avert a prompt and emphatic refusal to have anything to do with me.

Prince D. K. (who avows himself a Re-incarnationist of the school of Kardec) adverts to "the false circle of mysticism and dogmatic sectarianism in which the Russian Spiritists are too often confined." He mentions an article by M. Aksakow lately published in the Moscow journal La Russie, replying to another by Dr. Saloviev entitled "The Heresies of the Russian Aristocracy." The Prince concludes a letter of considerable length with a passage of some eloquence, which I fear might be missed in my translation.

SPIRITUALISM.

No. II.

Cultivation of Mediumship.—By Hudson Tuttle.

The prevalent conception of mediumship is: a state of passivity in which the individual can be used by spirit intelligences as an instrument, and as such, of necessity, the medium is wholly irresponsible. As a general statement, this view outlines the truth, but is insufficient and misleading, and conveys an inadequate, unsatisfactory, and erroneous impression of the phases and conditions of spirit control.

The faculty or state of mediumship is not a freak of nature, nor a gift from a Divine source, but like the senses is common to all human beings. As the senses vary in different individuals, and at different times in the same individual, so sensitiveness varies. Some persons have exquisitely keen sight, while in others it is dim; some hear the slightest sounds, while others can hear only the loudest reports; some catch the faintest perfumes, while others are able to sense only the most pungent odours. In the same manner, while all possess the quality of sensitiveness, in some it is dormant; in others indistinctly blended with their physical senses, while in a few it is dominant. It is a faculty capable of cultivation, and also of nearly complete extinction.

There are two methods of its cultivation: The first is what may be called the negative or passive, by which the medium is led to merge his identity in that of the controlling intelligences, and become a mere puppet to do their bidding. Astonishing results are often produced by this method, but the medium yields his individuality, and becomes the sport of unknown and irresponsible influences. The passive condition which allows pure spiritual beings to come en rapport with such, opens wide the portals for the approach of the low and depraved, and what is of more vital consequence, to mortals of every grade! The position which such mediums at last attain is one of greatest danger. They have lost self-control, the power of will, and are as magnetic needles trembling to every influence, good or bad. If a spirit can entrance them and make them utter its thoughts, it can compel them to act as it desires. They may be carefully attended and guarded by good intelligences, and their friends may surround them, but the time will come when the guard will be broken and the lower influences gain sway. The stronger magnetic power of some mortal may lead wide astray and leave the medium a despised victim of the most degrading passions.

Examples of this method will at once suggest themselves to the experienced reader. They are only too many, and the once shining lights now in darkness present the saddest picture in the pages of Spiritualism.

The second method for the cultivation of mediumship is that of individual growth, which may be called the positive method. Individuality is not yielded, nor the will benumbed. The sensitive faculty becomes a means of receptivity, instead of passivity. It is like a new sense, yielding its proper mental stimulus, as the hearing or sight. Such mediumship is strengthened by study and thought. It may come unrecognised, or like a flash of light bear great thoughts to the mind. The great souls standing along the stream of time like beacon flames, lighting the wastes of darkness, were of this class. Thought, intense study, self-absorption, unconsciously to them prepared their minds for the inflowing of the tide of spiritual intelligence, and also for its understanding and radiation.

Often it is said in sorrow or with a sneer, that if the utterances of the trance-speaker are those of Webster or of Parker, they have lost their wits; and that the prescriptions of once eminent physicians are the recipes of quacks and pretenders. Think of this subject for a moment! Would the spirit Webster follow the wanderings of a frail woman, for the purpose of speaking to an audience, affected only with wonder, or his name? Would he not rather find the Senate Chamber the most agreeable, and if he had a measure to suggest, would he not find a receptive mind on the floor, to whom he could impart it?

Is it not correct in reason to suppose that the statesmen of the past will gather at the Capitol, and impart their ideas to those who can at once place them before the country? But it is said in reply, the senators and representatives are not mediums. True, not the passive tools such are popularly supposed to be, but who shall say that the far-reaching statesmanship, which at times cuts through the fog and darkness, is not an impression from a superior source. The spirits of statesmen would be drawn to those who made government a study, and to them would they impart their ideas.

In the same manner the spirit of the skilful physician returns, not to further the selfish ends of some ignorant charlatan, but to the thoughtful practitioner, and astonishes him with the accuracy of diagnosis or effect of prescriptions which the recipient thinks are from his own mind.

The passive medium may write or speak in verse, claiming some great poet as the source, to the disgust of those who read or listen, and Spiritualism is scorned for the barrenness of thought and rudeness of expression. Not so fast. The spirit poet would seek the poet, and with responsive soul, enlarge and beautify his thoughts. When the exquisite verse crystallises, and on winged words departs as a messenger to the world, the astonished poet trembles with delight at the beauty of what he supposes his own creation, while really it is a joint product.

Hence will be seen the absolute necessity of thorough culture of all the faculties of the mind conjointly and harmoniously with the receptive or sensitive state

Mediumship should be a state of exalted concentration, hence mediums have great need of self-control and self-reliance. The mistaken ideas of the character and requirements of mediumship have borne bitter fruits, and it is to be hoped that their correct understanding will not only clear away the accumulated rubbish, but bear the cause to higher grounds.

[The following letter contributed by Mr. Tuttle to the Harbinger of Light is also to the point, and should be read in conjunction with the above.—ED. OF "LIGHT."] Hudson Tuttle.

Mediumship.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "HARBINGER OF LIGHT."

SIR,—I find in reading the pages of your excellent journal, a constant demand for mediums, and regrets that mediumship is not more common. I am deeply impressed by this state of affairs, to write a brief communication on the subject. The desire for foreign mediums about whom wonderful things are recorded, is well enough, and perhaps should such be secured good results might follow. Yet as the conditions of mediumship are so varied, evanescent, and as yet undetermined, no one can safely predict results. I have watched with great interest the effects of public mediumship, and contrasted it with what may be called that of home growth, and I am in favour of the latter. While public mediumship has its place, and has accomplished a great work, I think the home circle is the more appropriate place for satisfactory investigation.

All are more or less sensitive, and it would be difficult to select six or eight persons, without securing at least one whose sensitiveness would develop into noteworthy mediumship.

Now I have to recommend this to the Australian friends who are seeking for light. Do not wait the coming of some remarkable personage; they may not come, and should they the chances are you will be disappointed. Form a circle of your family, or such friends as sympathise with you. The arbitrary rules laid down are of little force, in regard to numbers, arrangement in the circle, &c. Of course true and worthy persons should be selected, who are in earnest and desirous of arriving at the truth. The number of ladies and gentlemen should be equal and not to exceed ten or twelve, nor less than six. The circle should be formed around a table by resting hands on its top; joining hands is not especially recommended; singing is of benefit by its harmonising influence; an eager, over-expectant state of mind is to be carefully avoided, and in order to do so, light conversation and a happy disposition are to be cultivated. The circles should be held with stated regularity, for it is presumable the engagement will be kept on the part of the spirit-friends, who form a most important element in the result.

We have known circles receiving excellent manifestations, some member being at once developed as a speaking or writing medium, at the first séance, but such a result is not to be expected. The members ought not to become discouraged if they meet many times without receiving any manifestations. The spirit-friends are quite as anxious to give as we are to receive, but they are as unacquainted with the laws of control, perhaps, as we, and time is necessary. A person may have the possibilities of sensitiveness, yet uncultivated, and it is only by means of sitting that a higher sensitiveness can be gained. A certain relation must become established between the medium and the spirit.

Then an important element of success is patience; we became acquainted with a circle of twelve earnest people who met once each week for a year before they received the least sign, and then it seemed as though a flood of manifestations came. The fact was their earnestness was a bar against them, which required time to wear away.

There is probably a medium in every family in Australia, and if proper means be employed to develop their latent faculty, the effort will be repaid many fold.

There is far more satisfaction in sitting in a circle with relatives and known friends, than with strangers. When will our departed friends come, if not to the home circle? If they come and communicate with us through strangers, it is because they have no choice, they not being able to approach the dearer friends. It is a duty we owe them to provide the means for their communion with us by forming home circles. Then we shall find that the vacant chair holds unseen the dear one gone, with heart tender and true, anxious to make known to us his presence.

VOICES IN THE AIR.

I have, bound up with other curiosities of occult literature, a pamphlet, published in London in 1706, entitled, "A Wonderful Account from Orthez, in Bearn, and the Cevennes, of Voices heard in the Air, Singing the Praises of God, in the Words and Tunes of the Psalms used by those of the Reformed Religion, at the time of their cruel and inhuman Persecution, and the Destruction of their public Worship, by the French King. Credibly attested by the Certificates of Monsieur Jerien, and many other Ministers and People, Inhabitants of those Places, who heard the said Singing in the Air, which some of them call the Singing of Angels."

As I do not remember to have seen this record elsewhere cited, I will give the substance of the account, which is too long to be copied entirely. (Compare it with a similar manifestation which brought comfort to the monks of the Charterhouse, on the eve of the suppression of their establishment. Froude's History of England, ed. 1870, Vol. II. c. 9.)

It seems that the report of these mysterious singings had been already prevalent after the suppression of the public worship of the Protestants at the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, in many places, before M. Jerien, one of the banished French ministers, made from Holland a particular inquiry into the evidence for the phenomenon at Orthez and parts of the Cevennes. Several original testimonies of persons of credit and repute, who themselves heard the voices, are printed at length, as well as much general hearsay. The singing was heard usually in the night-time, but occasionally at mid-day. It attracted multitudes of people, who resorted every night to the parts of the city where it was to be heard. These assemblies were prohibited by the magistrates. Not only the Protestants heard it, but even bigoted Papists, as they were constrained to admit, ascribing it (of course) to the devil. Every precaution is said to have been taken against artifice; but the character of the phenomenon, and the places where it was heard, made this supposition quite inadmissible. The singing is described as up in the air, consisting of many voices in harmony. The tunes were identified as those of the psalms and hymns usually sung in the Protestant churches, and many of the witnesses professed to distinguish the words. "I confess," says one of the witnesses, "I only heard a charming music that represented a great number of voices that agreed exceedingly well, but I could not distinguish the words; there was one that raised his voice above the rest, and made himself observed when the rest had done. After I had a long while heard the melody with ravishment, I perceived that these voices drew off, and abated by little and little, till they were insensibly lost in the air. The same evening, returning to my own house, and discoursing at the gate with many of my neighbours of the marvellous things we had heard; on a sudden the same voices again saluted our ears, and filled us with new delight for a quarter of an hour, and then withdrew as before. The Tuesday following, in the evening (being calm), being with one of my relatives at the door of my own house, we both heard a number of voices in the air, which resounded with strength, and made themselves heard with greatest clearness." One of the witnesses estimated the voices at two or three thousand. "After the church at Orthez was razed to the ground, this singing ceased, till about October following, and then was again heard by many of that city, and by many that came out of the country to market, and stayed all night on purpose. It ordinarily happened about the same hour, between eight and nine at night; some heard the words, others the tune of the psalms; and there is scarce a house in Orthez in which some of the family hath not heard it. . . . To conclude, it is impossible to doubt of a truth, which the far greatest part of the inhabitants of Orthez are able to certify, and to which the Parliament of Bearn have also given their testimony by a decree, which forbids men to hear these psalms, or to say they have heard them, on the forfeiture of 500 crowns, and the Councils of Orthez published these ordinances in their city." (That is how unacceptable evidence was dealt with in the seventeenth century. Mutatis mutandis, the same spirit is alive now; though it is the bigotry of a shallow "enlightenment" that issues its decrees; and its penalties—ridicule and scorn and pseudo-scientific denunciation—are more dreaded by many than would be "the forfeiture of 500 crowns.")

"The same thing hath happened in the Cevennes. As this country is full of mountains, where there are echoes, which multiply and return the voice, and as night assemblies have continually been made there, where they sing psalms with a loud voice, therefore the relation of singings [in the air] may seem the more doubtful. But the affair of Orthez, which is a close country and without mountains, being well proved, I see no reason" (says M. Jerien) "to question that of Cevennes; and shall therefore without scruple produce the certificates which come from that country."

"But as to the business of singing the praises of God," writes one of M. Jerien's correspondents from the Cevennes, "it is necessary that I speak to you of the miracle which makes so much noise in this country. Which is, that since the entire loss of our church's and our pastors, there has been heard in the air, voices and sounds of instruments, very melodious; and that which is most extraordinary is that many persons distinguish the tunes of the psalms. I can assure you of the truth thereof, since I myself have distinguished more than thirty. It has been told me that my brother, M. de Mont Vaillant, distinguishes them all perfectly well. . . . I had forgotten to tell you that the noise of a drum is here heard so clearly, that nobody can doubt thereof, no more than about the singing of psalms; for there are so many persons of good understandings convinced thereof that we ought to give up ourselves to the power of truth. I do avow that the thing passes all imagination; but be assured that all care imaginable has been taken to prevent delusion."

I have given but fragments of the evidence printed in this pamphlet. C. C. M.

INTERESTING MANIFESTATIONS.

Since the publication of Mr. S. C. Hall's account of "Interesting Manifestations," in our issue of November 17th, he has received the following letter bearing upon the subject, and has kindly forwarded it to us for publication:—

DEAR MR. HALL,—Thank you very much for sending me "LIGHT," containing your very interesting letter. It has given me great comfort, for I have long seen the same sort of things, and have been puzzled to account for them, half fearing that the lights were the imaginings of my own brain, but I am learning now to distinguish between the two.

There is a white light, which seems to come from my own eyes in regular beats sometimes, but every night I see a great deal of clear light, filled with innumerable pin points of greater light, and flashes like miniature lightning and sudden stars, and across the light go backwards and forwards faint shadows; and one night I saw for one instant, close to me, a lovely face behind the moving air, which was like a cloud over it. I do not know the face—a woman's—but I saw the shining brown hair in a low knot at the back of the head, and the perfect forehead, nose, and mouth, and wonderful clear eyes—all like a living face, not shadowy. Your letter makes me hope that I, too, shall be privileged to see my dearest husband, who, I know, is with me continually. Why, even as I write in broad daylight, a beautiful white star flashes out before me, and often I see an intensely blue star. My medium (my daughter) is gone, so I have no séances, but the lights increase more and more. Ah! how good is God to give us so much.—I am, dear Sir, yours very truly,

November 23rd.

Mrs. A. M. Howitt Watts has also written to Mr. S. C. Hall as follows, respecting his recent article on "Children":—

I have just finished reading your most touching and truly heavenly-spirited paper on "Children" in "LIGHT," and cannot resist my impulse to tell you how beautiful and true I feel it!

The words given from my dear father are very beautiful, and from their likeness to himself I recognise at once his identity in them. He loved children with all his heart, and nothing would be more accordant with his spirit than to comfort you by speaking of your charming daughter. This paper of yours I trust will bring conviction to many hearts.

In the set of spirit communications which my parents received (many years ago), professing to be from their children in Heaven (reference to which is made in my biographical sketch of my dear father), there are descriptions of the life in Heaven, identical with the glimpses you give in this paper. Infants who had passed from earth—having only breathed its atmosphere for a few hours or days—were there encountered as spirits of a most innocent and celestial order—having gone on maturing in the sunshine of God, and under the instructions of angels, and awaiting reunion with their relatives in the completed circle of love. "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard (fully), nor hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive what God has prepared for those who love Him." But we do have glimpses indeed granted us: and not far-off glimpses either.

Of course you know Miss Theobald's little book about children in Heaven—one of the series called "Heaven Opened." Her descriptions are also in entire accord with yours.

The Popular Life of Buddha.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—After the sympathetic, and I must add highly flattering, notices of the "Popular Life of Buddha" that have been printed in "LIGHT," it seems to me that I must appear to their authors (the editor and "M.A. (Oxon)") the most ungrateful of mortals if I utter a word of protest; but I wish to point out that the work has a higher aim than merely to correct the Buddhism of the Christian Knowledge Society.

For many years I had studied the question, what were the ancient "mysteries," and the ancient "wisdom"? In this fascinating quest I had ransacked many works on the Rosicrucians, the Gnostics, the Kabbalists, and the Magicians. I had dived into T. Taylor and the Mysteries of Eleusis, and seen the "Apocalypse," "Isis," and "Freemasonry" unveiled over and over again. Gleams of light flashed about here and there, no doubt; but when the "Adept," the "Occultist," the "Esoteric" teacher approached the Adytum of the temple he always put on a look of alarming profundity and announced that some secrets were too great for mortal utterance. This proceeding suggested a doubt that was rife when a certain lawyer was Chancellor of England: "It is impossible for anyone," said Pitt, "to be so wise as Thurlow looks!" I must confess that until I was fortunate enough to read M. Foucaux's translation of the Lalita Vistara, or Life of Buddha, I made little progress in my occultist studies; and it was not until I had read it carefully two or three times over when preparing my most recent volume that its full importance dawned upon me. I consider it by far the most valuable work that the student of ancient mysteries can study.

In very plain language, the work itself makes this claim. It professes to "reveal" the "secrets" of the Adepts or Buddhas. It professes to shew a mortal how to gain "supernatural powers," the "divine vision," calmness, purity, self-mastery. It professes to shew him how to gain the eight spiritual, or as modern mystics would say, the eight interior states, the "Kusa mat of Indra, the Conqueror" ("he who overcometh" of the Apocalypse), the "Kusa mat of Brahma," and so on. (Foucaux's translation, pp. 7, 401, et seq.) Oddly enough, too, it exhausts all the vocabulary of Christian mystics and talks of the "mystical annihilation," "the mystical death," like Madame Guyon and St. Francois de Sales. My work is an attempt to give a digest of it, elucidated with extracts from other prominent Buddhist and Brahmanical mystical works; but I recommend everybody to study the work itself in Foucaux's translation.

From the earliest days, man knew that he had a great destiny before him. This was to unite himself at length, without loss of individuality, with the Great Spirit of the Universe. Thus a delicate problem arose, namely, how to find some analogy or symbolic connection between the bifurcate mammal, man, and the splendid mountains and seas and stars that clothed the Great Spirit. The solution was twofold:—

1. The mystic got to image God as a transcendental man in whom vicegerency of the universe, the fatherly and motherly principles, and the seven legions of immortal spirits were combined. This is the Adam Kadmon of the Kabbalist, who united in his person the ten Sephiroths. This is also the Purusha of India.

2. The second solution took for symbol that portion of heaven seen by night with the ecliptic for rim and the Dragon for apex, and called it the Temple of God. This accounts for the ecliptic being the point of departure for all the symbolism of the mystic. In Buddhism he is called, "He who has turned in the Zodiac." The early Christians according to Bingham were called "Temples of God." The culminating point of the year was the Feast of the Tabernacle, the Feast of the Tree. It was feigned that an imaginary diameter passing through Virgo (the Indian Tree) divided the circle of the ecliptic into two kingdoms, or cities of the soul, the Kāmaloka, the domain of the mystic Jezebel, and the Brahmaloaka, the Apocalyptic New Jerusalem. Buddhism throws a valuable light upon the way in which the Essenes and early Christians viewed these two mystic domains, and on an infinity of mystical ideas. In one city was wealth, luxury, and rich food, palaces, jewelled wives, the cringing of courtiers and the proffered sceptre of Kapila vastu. The other city promised famine, beggary, and nakedness, "blows with a stick," say the Buddhist books, and "persecutions without end," the terrible visions of the fasting ascetic, the forms that in marble and jade still grotesquely guard the portals of Christian and Buddhist temples. An absolute line of demarcation was drawn between these two cities by Christ and Buddha because each knew the peril of attempting to enter the mystic portal without the pantafoes and tetra grammations of continence and self-mastery. The "mystic contemplation," as Clement of Alexandria calls it, the self mesmerism of Yoga that induces visions and occult powers, was under each system merely means to an end. Buddha's movement was not Quietism but a protest against the Quietism that he found in India. His "beggars" in rags were ordered to march forth and preach Dharma to every nation under Heaven. A second school of Buddhism by-and-bye arose which restored the ancient Quietism and Occultism. If the "Brothers" of Tibet are due, as claimed, to the movement of Tsoukhapa, they must belong to this school. I know that my exposition of Buddhism is called "Exoteric" by the Theosophists. I might turn the tables and shew Tibetan books which lay down the mystifications which the tyro is to be first of all amused with, before he is told much. I will, however, content myself with pointing out that my "Exoteric" Buddhism won India and the "Esoteric" Buddhism lost it.

ARTHUR LILLIE.

A Perplexing Experience. To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—May I send a few words to your excellent paper, with a view to throwing light upon the perplexity of your contributor, "E. D."

His patience in continuing to sit for writing under such annoying difficulties deserves high praise. As my own experience was very similar, I will briefly relate it, and trust to your kindness to insert my remarks.

A few years ago, without the least expectation or wish on my part, my hand and arm were controlled to write. It would be tedious to relate all the particulars, suffice it to say that I was seized upon and made to write, but only the most confused stuff. I came to the conclusion that I would consult an experienced Spiritualist who had written books, automatically. I did so, and he very kindly advised me to put myself into the hands of a developing medium, and he gave me the name of one. I followed the advice, and after (I think) two or three sittings with the medium, I could write quite legibly in what I should describe as a large round hand, not my own writing at all. My writings used to remind me of telegrams—no stops, &c.

By this means I got a coherent message from a departed friend, and when it was finished the control left me, and has not returned.

If "E. D." will try the plan, I think he would at least get to know if the spirits had anything to say through him.

As to "hellish influences," the devil, &c., it is well known that undeveloped spirits often call themselves freely by the name of that mythical personage, as they use the names of Robert Burns or Martin Luther. They seem to think it makes them important to use the names of distinguished persons.—I remain, Sir,

Hair Growing from Casts. To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Signor Damiani will be interested to learn that the above is by no means a singular phenomenon, nor is he the first who has observed it. The fact has been repeatedly noticed, and has given rise to some interesting discussion by correspondents in "Notes and Queries." Not to occupy your space with the pros and cons, and the various suggestions offered, I will give Signor Damiani the following references which I have noted on the subject:—Notes and Queries, Fourth Series, Vol. VI., p. 524; Vol. VII., pp. 66, 83, 130, 222, 290, 315, 476; Vol. VIII., p. 335; Vol. XI., pp. 106, 186. Fifth Series, XI., p. 507; XII., p. 293 (in which last place appears a letter on the subject from Mr. Henry G. Atkinson). "Is it likely," writes "G. H. H." (last reference but one), "that a distinguished sculptor and myself are labouring under delusion in half believing that human hair grows long after death, and under the following peculiar circumstances? The friends of a nobleman who died about five years ago, employed the sculptor to make a bust of their deceased relative. For this end a mould was taken, shortly after death, of the head and face, and from this mould a cast was made. It came out clean, and with no sign of hair adhering to it. About three years ago the sculptor first mentioned to me as a matter of common occurrence, not only observed by himself, but by others, that hair often grew from casts. I smiled at the idea, of course, as many of your readers will doubtless. Taking up a cast—the one referred to—and holding it to the light, I saw numerous hairs, about half an inch long, springing in, apparently, a natural manner from the head and face, chiefly on the temples and eyebrows. A week ago we examined this cast again, and we both at once remarked that the hair had increased in length, particularly over the eyebrows. I may add that we examined other casts, made under similar conditions, and found hair on nearly all of them. I enclose, with his permission, the sculptor's name."

I shall cut out Signor Damiani's communication in "LIGHT," and forward it to Notes and Queries, as the latest contribution to this curious discovery, though I am myself far from attributing the fact to "spiritual" agency. C. C. M.

Resurrection. To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I have constantly read "LIGHT" since the first copy was issued, and have never found a number without interest. May I ask you to let your readers know of a book lately put into my hands, which I am convinced will give immense satisfaction to the students of Spiritualism in its highest aspects. It is by the Regius Professor of Divinity, Cambridge, B. Westcott—"The Gospel of the Resurrection." A short quotation may allow your readers to judge of what manner of book it is. (P. 50, paragraph 28) "While we admit that the tendency of a scientific age is adverse to a living belief in miracles, we see that this tendency is due, not to the antagonism of science and miracle, but to the neglect, and consequent obscuration by science, of that region of thought (in which the miraculous finds scope). And even here, the power of feeling makes itself most distinctly felt, against the power of abstract reason. Exactly when material views of the Universe seem to be gaining ground, and an absolute ascendancy; popular instinct finds expression, now in this form of extravagant credulity, and now in that Arrogant physicalism is met by superstitious spiritualism; and there is right on both sides. The harmony of a true faith finds a witness to its fulness in this independent assertion of the antithetic elements, which it tempers and refines. There are causes which impress a very distinct character on different cycles of miracles, and on the form which the belief in the miraculous assumes at different periods. This investigation is full of interest, and contributes in a remarkable degree to illustrate the progressive forms of revelation. If miracles are neither unnatural, nor impossible, it follows that the record of them cannot be inherently incredible."

"Is the present and the finite the definite limit of (not only the mode) but of the object of humanity? Is there no faculty by which a man can contemplate the temporal a true image of the eternal? Is there no fact which unites the seen and unseen? Can the soul reach forward to fuller forms of being?—Can it with joy regard its proper heritage, a future appearance in the fulness of a glorified humanity before God?"

MRS. HARDINGE BRITTEN'S APPOINTMENTS.—Mrs. Hardinge Britten will lecture in Manchester, Tuesday, January 6th, 1884; in Newcastle, Sunday, January 13th and 20th; and Manchester, the 27th inst. Also in Liverpool and Manchester on the alternate Sundays of February.

GATESHEAD-ON-TYNE.—On Sunday evening last the Spiritualists of Gateshead listened to a farewell lecture on the "Immortality of Man," which was given in the Central Buildings, by Mr. Henry Burton, who leaves during the week for Queensland. The lecturer from three premises, viz., nature, reason, and revelation, proved admirably that man enjoyed an innate immortality and that behind all evanescent forms of matter there ever existed distinctive permanency. One word expresses the influence of the lecture; it was "masterly." Affectionate and hearty votes of thanks were accorded to Mr. Burton at the close.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M.A. (Oxon.)"

The Indians of British Guiana seem to be attracting attention. Last week, I referred to a book by Mr. im Thurn, in which some interesting psychological details are given. Since that time I have come upon another book of legends and myths, collected by a missionary,* who has spent some time among those aboriginal peoples. It has unfortunately occurred to the collector of these legends to adopt what he calls a metrical form, and to embody what is often charming and beautiful in spirit in doggerel that disfigures it utterly. A simple recital of these primitive legends would have been full of interest. As now presented they are intolerably wearisome. The head men of the tribes were, it seems, mostly sorcerers, and have "in the vicinity of our missions, nearly all passed away." With them, many a legend has died, and many that remain have received an admixture of what the missionaries have superficially taught. They are concerned with God and the future of the soul, which, in the case of the Arawaks, was singularly simple and pure:—an universal Father, a future of light and life for those who have done their duty here, a hell of woe and possible extinction for the wicked.

The Waraus, more concerned with warfare, had bow and arrows buried in their graves to fight their way into the spirit-land. Those of them who settled in Trinidad (as Kingsley mentions in "At Last," ch. 8), conceived with poetic beauty that the pure souls of the good were enshrined in the bejewelled body of the humming bird, and spent an eternity of bliss in darting from flower to flower. It is curious to note that among all these tribes the legends shew a belief in a descent from a higher state of existence. The Caribs tell how, in a superior state, the first men saw this world that it was soiled and stained, and descended to purify it. A cloud conveyed them, but, as they toiled, it receded and left them helpless in a world of sin. Other legends are less poetical, but all shew a similar tendency, and a curious parallelism with the Mosaic records. We have the Fall, or Descent into Matter: the subjugation of the animals to man: a Deluge: and many other parallelisms in legends which are stated to be primitive and antecedent to the introduction of Christianity.

When an Arawak suffers from pain or disease he summons a sorcerer. The medicine man appears with a large rattle called a "shok-shok" and some tobacco. With the rattle he creates a dreadful din, while he roars his incantations, and shouts at the fiends of disease. He puffs the smoke of the tobacco up the nostrils of the sick man, and then proceeds to pound and rub the part affected. This done he applies his mouth, and sucking hard, removes from it a nail, or thorn, or claw, or some such thing which he declares the fiend has put into the sick man. The mesmeric pounding and rubbing are common, I believe, to most primitive peoples as a cure for pain.

The University of Pennsylvania, which it will be remembered, lately received a large bequest under the will of Henry Seybert for the impartial investigation of the phenomena of Spiritualism, has appointed a committee for that purpose. Dr. Pepper, Provost of the University, is chairman, and the Rev. G. S. Fullerton is secretary. It has been decided to commence with "the collection of authoritative and representative literature" of the subject. Dr. Fullerton has been "entrusted with the main work of accumulating the necessary literature, and he will also prepare a suitable historical sketch of modern Spiritualism." Dr. Fullerton, it is to be hoped, has nothing else to do, and is in the enjoyment of vigorous health. For he has his work cut out, and will need a long time to complete it. The literature of Spiritualism in English, German, French, and other tongues to say nothing of that which lies closer to Dr. Fullerton's hands in his own country, is vast in bulk, and will need careful sifting. It is characteristic of it that a few grains of wheat are often buried beneath a mountain of chaff; but the Committee wants the wheat, and the chaff must be winnowed. This will involve a far greater expenditure of time than "the entire winter," which is prescribed as sufficient. The members of the Committee are laudably anxious that it should be known that "no one of them have any bias nor prejudice existing in their minds which would prevent them from joining in a thoroughly impartial examination." It would be unfair to hold them responsible for this remarkable piece of grammar. It is the Philadelphia Press's way of putting it. It is well, however, while giving all credit for impartiality to these gentlemen, to note also that no one of them has any knowledge of the subject which would qualify him to conduct so delicate an investigation.

Professor Max Müller contributes to the Pall Mall Gazette an account of one whom he calls "a great religious reformer,"—Dayānanda (or Dayānund) Sarasvatī, the founder of the Arya Samāj, who has recently died. Dayānund was a scholar deeply read in the theology of his country, and profoundly possessed with the belief that the Vedas were the final and complete revelation of the Divine will. For him a question was absolutely settled by a reference to the Vedas, just as for many amongst us a text from the Bible clinches an argument. "Whatever was not to be found in the Vedas he declared to be false or useless: whatever was found there was to him beyond the reach of controversy." It is instructive to note that like Western believers in the verbal inspiration and plenary authority of Scripture, he was acquainted with no sacred writings but those of his own religion. Like them, too, he spent infinite pains in twisting words from their plain meaning in order to bolster up a preconceived theory. Since the Vedas were (ex hypothesi) the word of Brahma; and since nothing could (of course) be hid from the infinite Wisdom, it followed that the Vedas must contain all knowledge. "To him not only was everything contained in the Vedas perfect truth, but he went a step further, and by the most incredible interpretations succeeded in persuading himself and others that everything worth knowing, even the most recent inventions of modern science, were alluded to in the Vedas. Steam engines, railways, and steamboats, all were shewn to have been known to the poet of the Vedas, for Veda, he argued, meant Divine knowledge, and how could anything have been hid from that?" It matters not where a man is born. Dayanund has many Western parallels, who regard our Bible as the encyclopedia of all possible knowledge, and even find in the recent atmospheric phenomena a literal fulfilment of prophecy. Are not, they say, the heavens literally "turned into blood," and is not "the great and terrible day" at hand?

Foolish as Dayanund's Vedic beliefs may seem when analysed, we have no right to cast a stone at them; nor to doubt the honesty of the man who professed them. Professor Max Müller compares him with Dr. Pusey; but he was differentiated from the great Anglo-Catholic in that his mind was set on reform, while Dr. Pusey's aim was to revert to the old ways, and to the faith of primitive Catholicity. Dayanund was before all a reformer, and he shared the fate of all his kind. "The aid of the police had often to be called in to protect him from the blows of his conquered foes" after some successful public disputation with learned Pundits at Benares or elsewhere. The pioneers of unpopular truth fare as badly in India, it seems, as in England. "This blasphemer" is the ready response now and there, as it was in the days of the Christ. But Dayanund left his mark on his age, and the Arya Samaj is one of the most influential Protestant bodies (if I may be allowed the expression) in India.

Professor Max Müller makes a very brief and passing allusion to Dayanund's connection with Theosophy. It was short and stormy, and there is no reason to recall the story. "There is," the Professor writes, "a curious autobiographical sketch of his life published in an Indian journal, The Theosophist. Some doubts, however, have been thrown on the correctness of the English rendering of that paper." The autobiography thus referred to was published in The Theosophist, of October, 1879, and subsequent months. It was written expressly for that journal, and I have never heard that its accuracy was impugned by the Swami or by any of his friends. It is an extremely interesting and instructive record of a great and single-minded life. Whether the Arya Samaj will long survive its founder is not doubtful. The true life is in the Brahma Samaj over which Chunder Sen presides. Its contact with Western knowledge keeps it fresh and free from stagnation. Though I am aware this is a heretical utterance, I entirely believe that free intercourse between members of various forms of faith, and a comprehensive grasp of all religious systems, is productive of a breadth and largeness of view which the profoundest study of one aspect of truth is unable to afford. If Dayanund had realised the fact that God had revealed Himself outside of the Vedas, he would have saved himself a terrible waste of time and energy in tortuous exegesis. If he had recognised the fact that the Vedas contain much childish nonsense he would have been a wiser man. But then "if one chapter, one verse, one word of the Vedas had to be surrendered as coming from a human source, the whole edifice of his faith would have crumbled to pieces." And so in East and West alike men shut their eyes, and as children say, "make believe very much," lest they should cease to believe at all!

It has been suggested to me that the case of healing by means of Lourdes water which I noted last week is important enough to warrant the preservation in full of the medical testimony. I think it is, and accordingly append the two certificates to which I referred.

The second certificate is as follows:—

"I, the undersigned, certify that for about thirty years Mr. Macary, carpenter, of Lavaur, has been attacked by varicose veins with enormous nodosities in the legs, frequently complicated by large ulcers, in spite of the compression exerted by appropriate stockings or bandages, that these symptoms have disappeared suddenly, and that to-day there only remains a nodosity, sensibly diminished, in the inner and upper part of the right leg.—Lavaur, August 25th, 1871 (Signed), ROSSIGNOL, Doctor of Medicine."

The third medical certificate is as follows:—

"François Macary, sixty years old, carpenter, of Lavaur, member of the Society of Saint Louis, consulted us about twenty years ago for varicose veins, which filled up the left popliteal hollow and inside of the knee and of the leg. We then observed towards the lower third part of this limb a varicose ulcer, with thickened edges, with considerable and painful engorgement of the tissues. There was besides, both in and outside the upper part of the calf, two large old scars, which had nothing to do with the affection for which we were consulted, and which were the result of a gunshot received by the patient twenty years previously. There were so many enlarged veins, and they were enlarged to so great an extent, that so far as we were concerned, the surgical means with which one treats this disease were formally contra-indicated. Macary appeared to us to be the victim of an infirmity which would last him his life, and we advised only palliatives which several of our brethren had already advised. Eighteen years later,—that is two years ago,—Macary presented himself to consult us again. The state of his leg had grown much worse. We confirmed our former prognosis, and told him it was of urgent necessity for him to get the ulcer to cicatrise, to submit himself, as the only means, to absolute and prolonged rest in bed, and to the application of regular dressings. To-day, August 15th, 1871, Macary appears for the third time. The ulcer is perfectly cicatrised. There is nothing compressing the leg, and nevertheless there does not exist the shadow of engorgement. What surprises us, above all, is that the varicose knots (poquets) have entirely disappeared; and that where they were before, one can feel some small strings, hard, empty of blood, and yielding under the pressure of the fingers. The interior saphene vein has its normal direction and volume. The most attentive examination affords no trace of a surgical operation. According to the account of Macary, this radical cure was produced in the course of a single night, and under the influence of nothing but the application of some compresses wetted by water drawn from the Grotto of Lourdes. We conclude that, apart from Macary's story, science is impotent to explain this fact; for [medical] authors give us no experience of anything at all similar. They are all unanimous on this point, that varicose veins, left to themselves, are incurable; that they are not cured by palliatives, and still less spontaneously; that they go on getting worse steadily, and that one can only hope for any radical cure by the application of surgical means which involve grave dangers to the patients. And though the fact asserted by Macary would not be proved by evidence taken from any one else, still it would not the less remain for us a fact of the most extraordinary kind, and—let us say it out plainly—a supernatural fact. In which faith we sign the contents of the present report.—BENNET, M.D., of the Faculty of Paris, August 15th, 1871."

POETRY OF THE HON. RODEN NOEL.*

FIRST NOTICE.

The poetry of Mr. Noel has met with extremely high encomium from contemporary criticism, both abroad and at home. It has been compared in various of its qualities to the compositions of Wordsworth, Coleridge, Shelley, Blake, and Heine—poets assuredly of very diverse orders of excellence—all, however, united in the one master attribute of the poet, namely, Imagination which deals with the deep things of the mind. It may interest the readers of "LIGHT" to make acquaintance with the writings of this warmly praised author.

We will, therefore, consider the two volumes which may be regarded as typical of a special gift possessed by him; the presentment of some metaphysical idea or true experience of the soul-life within the external form of verse, glowing and enriched with an almost super-abundance of poetical illustration; his imagination teems with images of great variety and beauty drawn from the worlds both of Art and Nature.

"A Little Child's Monument," was noticed in "LIGHT" upon its first appearance. Owing to the peculiar nature of its subject, which must appeal to the sympathies of so many readers, and to the genuine expression of deep human suffering which gave rise to this volume, "The Little Child's Monument" will ever remain one of the most popular of the author's productions. The reviewer in the British Quarterly aptly characterises this volume as "a wail of human anguish; in part a triumphant song of human faith," adding that here "we have an expression unique in its penetrating simplicity of the manifold torment of a great bereavement," and "that the simplest and the subtlest grief-stricken souls may find sustenance in its pages." Having passed out of the heart's earthquake, where, stunned by the blow, the brain reeled at first in the darkness of a sceptical questioning of Love-Divine, the ineffable beauty and tenderness of the external world, and the very reaction of grief itself, bring the poet gradually forth, step by step,—but ever and again for a time falling back into the desert of despair—into calm and holy contemplation of the Life-immortal. Gradually arises for the stricken hearts of the parents, the dawn of the new day, wherein is revealed in its transfigured and changeless beauty the abiding presence of the arisen spirit of their idolised child. For them has begun life also, in the true Paradise of God; and into this glory of the Resurrection they recognise that for all equally stricken human hearts, "a little child shall lead them."

"Cette sincérité, cette absence de toute pose dans l'expression de la plus intense douleur on la trouve à un degré peu commun dans 'A Little Child's Monument'; Lament,' qui dans sa simplicité presque sacrée est d'une incomparable beauté de forme," says a French critic, writing in Le Parlement. (Paris, June 10th, 1882.)

As a specimen of one of the most simple and touching of these poems, one of a Blake-like character, entitled "Music and the Child," we will extract a few stanzas, since the conviction comes to the reader irresistibly, that the experience of the symbolic dream is real, and was a dream-picture sent to comfort the human sorrow with a tenderness superhuman.

"An organ-player comes rarely round
To our lone moorland place;
My darling at the welcome sound,
Runs, with laughter in his face,
To the nursery window, hailing
With melodious mirth unfailing.

Who greets him in Italian.

Then he brings and sets a chair,
Humming over every air,
Feigns to turn a handle deftly,
Feigns to talk Italian swiftly,
Fair, in little blouse of blue,
Sweet of heart and form and hue.

Pale, my love, with dews of anguish
From the night beneath the curls,
Lies asleep; and while we languish
In despair, behold! there purls
A rill of music from afar:
Can the favourite organ jar
So upon our hearts? We fear
Lest it waken him; yet hear
Him, waking, pray for it to come
Under the window of his room,
Asking that his friend, the player,
May have food; we grant the prayer
Then he lists to every tune,
Growing very weary soon.

Baby lies upon the bed,
And our hearts with him lie dead.
Baby lies with fair white blossom
In his hair and hand and bosom;
Only he is lovelier far
Than earth's fairest flowers are!
And while we cower, smitten low
By our baby boy's death-blow,
Draws again the organ near . . .
Ah! Baby never more may hear.

Then in the depth of our despair,
A vision found we lying there.
She and I were cowering
Before the swoop of Death's dark wing
That, sweeping him to nothingness,
Plunged our souls in the abyss.
Stone-eyed, to stare upon the gloom
Frantic, to challenge the deaf tomb,
Beating upon its iron door
For him who shall return no more.

But I dreamt that she and I
Were gazing very mournfully
On the organ, as we deemed Disused and broken. Then it seemed
That his dear nurse, who loved him well,
And cherished more than I can tell,
Came unawares, and on her breast
She bore him whom we laid to rest,
Our darling, glorious, health-rosed,
Whose dark, dewy eyes reposed
On some far-off, enraptured vision
Of the children's realm elysian.
Ah! with what transport we kissed him!
Not dead! not dead! how'er we missed him.
Heaven, too, vouchsafes another token;
The little organ was not broken!
Lo! baby turns it round and round,
Rejoicing in the wonted sound,
Yea, singing in his blouse of blue,
Lovelier than we ever knew."

We have yet to speak of the most sustained production from the pen of Mr. Noel; that which, so far, has given most scope to the unquestionably weird powers of a singularly wild and fertile imagination—"The House of Ravensburg."

LIVERPOOL.—Last Sunday, at Rodney Hall, in this city, Mrs. Emma Hardinge Britten delivered two orations to highly appreciative audiences, the subject in the morning being "Occultism, Witchcraft, and Spiritualism," and in the evening "The Church of 1883 and 1884." At the close of the evening service, on the Chairman proposing a vote of thanks to Mrs. Britten for her services during the past year, she received quite an ovation, every evidence being given of the deservedly high estimation in which she is held here as elsewhere. Mrs. Britten will resume her services in Liverpool on the first Sunday in February, and we hope that she will continue them every alternate Sunday during the remainder of her stay in England.—Correspondent.

LEICESTER.—Mr. John Bent, of Town Hall-lane, a well-known Spiritualist, entertained a large number of friends at his residence, recently, on the occasion of his son, Mr. John Bent, jun., having attained his majority. Music, singing, games, and hearty congratulations occupied the evening. After supper an adjournment was made to a large room in Silver-street, where dancing and games were indulged in. Mr. and Mrs. Bent, with their children, are teetotalers, Mr. Bent having been a teetotaler forty years, and the secretary to the local Tent of Rechabites nearly thirty years.

"WHO ARE OUR SPIRITUAL ENEMIES?"

A PATCHWORK FROM BÖHME.

VI.

I hope that to any attentive reader of these attempts to explain the source of evil and sin, it may be said, "Seeing now we thus know what we are, and that God letteth us know it, we should now look to it and generate some good out of us, for we have the centre of Eternal Nature in us. If we make an angel out of us, then we are that; if we make a devil out of us, then we are that." ("Incarnation," part ii., chap. 9, pars. 12, 13, 14.) The all important question is how to make the angel. Let not our ability be doubted, if only the will be constant, for the spirit of man "is a son of the properties, and also a lord of the same, for in him consists the power; he may awaken which he please." ("Signatura Rerum," chap. 2, par. 25.) "For thou must know that in the government of thy mind thou art thine own lord and master, there will rise up no fire in thee in the circle or whole circumference of thy body and spirit unless thou awakenest it thyself." . . . "In whatever quality soever thou excitest or awakenest the spirit, and makest it operative, according to that same quality the thoughts rise up and govern the mind. If thou stirrest or awakenest the spirit in the fire then there ariseth in thee the bitter and harsh anger, for as soon as the fire is kindled, which is done in the hardness and fierceness, then springeth up the bitter fierceness or wrath in the flesh." ("Aurora," chap. 10., pars. 69, 70, 81.) . . . "Be it in love or in anger, that which thou liftest up thyself towards or against, thou kindest the quality of that, and that it is which burneth in thy compacted incorporated spirit. For when thou lookest upon anything which doth not please thee, but is contrary to thee, then thou raisest up the fountain of thy heart as when thou takest a stone and therewith striketh fire on a steel, and so when the spark catcheth fire in the heart then the fire kindleth. At first it gloweth, but when thou stirrest the source or foundation of the heart more violently, then it is as when thou blowest the fire, so that the flame is kindled, and then it is high time to quench it, else the fire will be too great and then burneth and consumeth, and doeth hurt to its neighbours." (Ibid, chap. 10., pars. 71, 72, 73.)

A more wordy exposition of a notorious fact than the Apostle's "Behold how great a fire a little matter kindleth!" But he spoke of the effect of sparks escaping in utterance; Böhm's object was to expose the forge on which they are first struck out. And here we have to remember that the kindling of wrath is not a mischief confined to one part of our being: in the words of St. James "it setteth on fire the whole course of nature," (wheel, or birth of nature, it is in the revised translation of the New Testament, and this precisely harmonises with Böhm's account of it. See "Aurora," chap. 16, pars. 11, 12, 13.) "If a creature which is like or as the whole being of God, spoileth, elevateth, or kindleth itself in a qualifying or fountain spirit, yet it kindleth not one spirit alone, but all the seven spirits." (Ibid, chap. 10, par. 7.) But how to prevent this kindling!—"For out of the essences go the senses or thoughts; they are and have their origin out of the harsh astringency; for they are the bitterness and run always into the mind as an anguish wheel, and seek rest to try whether they may attain to the liberty of God. They are they which strike up the fire in the anguish wheel. . . . "They are the mind's servants and are the subtlest messengers; they go into God, and again out of God into necessity. And whereinsoever they kindle themselves, either in God or in necessity, viz., in falsehood or wickedness, that they bring home to the mind. Therefore must the noble mind often be lord over the evil and stifle it in its anguish, when the thoughts have entertained or laden in false or evil imaginations into the desire." ("Treatise on the Incarnation," part 2, chap. 10, pars. 12, 17, 18.)

But the exceeding difficulty of that stifling! For while wrath lasts, we are animated by the eternal nature of wrath, which is incessantly giving birth to and substantialising its own creations, by reinforcements of justifying fancies; and "in the eternal nature of the wrath, the light or the kingdom of Heaven is not known, and also in the eternal kingdom of light, the kingdom of wrath is not known, because each kingdom is in itself. So is the soul of man also: it hath kingdoms in it; in which it tradeth, in that it standeth. If it trade in the kingdom of Heaven, then the kingdom of Hell is dead in it, not that it ceaseth, but the kingdom of Heaven is predominant, and the kingdom of fierceness is changed into joy; so also if it trade in the kingdom of wrath, then that is predominant, and the kingdom of Heaven is, as it were, dead; although, indeed, in itself, it doth not vanish, yet the soul is not in it." ("Three Principles," chap. 22, par. 90.) And this trading of the mind is for the most part so blindly eager! "If one property or quality ariseth and getteth above the other, then presently something followeth, so that the mind collecteth all its thoughts together and sendeth them to the members of the body, and so the hands and the feet, the mouth, and all go to work and do something, according to the desire of the mind, and then we say that form or property that directeth the work is predominant, qualifying, and working above other forms, wherein yet all other forms of nature lie yet hidden, and are subject to that one form; and yet the mind is such a wonderful thing that suddenly (out of one form that is now predominant, and working more than all others) it bringeth forth and raiseth another and quencheth the form that was kindled before, so that it becometh, as it were, a nothing, as may be seen in joy and sorrow." (Appendix to the "Three Principles," par. 3.) And in what is technically called conversion also. Transition from a hopeless sense of being driven to commit sin, and so strong a fear and loathing of it, however habitual, that it is shunned as the worst of evils, little as it is believed in by careless observers, is an historic fact in human nature, and is often as complete as it is sudden:—complete as regards a totally new starting point for the will, of course pitifully and most painfully incomplete as regards achievement of perfected conduct. Nor, when the dominion of each divided property is better understood, and the tyrannic power of rulers in their darkness more justly estimated, will the suddenness of conversion be so much a matter of surprise.

Just in that power of suddenly eliciting the influences of quite another world of thought and feeling, i.e., another property of our nature, lie at once our greatest danger and our greatest ability to escape from it. As to the danger, let a lucifer box remind us how destructive a force may lie still and harmless while untouched,—force that once kindled by the slightest accident, will suffice to destroy in a few moments the noblest handiworks of many a toilsome year. An angry word, a scornful look can as quickly set the whole mind aflame: and then one mind sets fire to another, and all former growth in love or holiness seems for the time as if it had not been; as we calm we are ready to think all goodwill and trust destroyed as well as present peace. But though much is lost, and future risk greatly increased, relief may be as sudden. The anger into which we have entered is God's anger, and must therefore scourge and plague us powerfully. "His anger is His strength and omnipotence and consuming fire; and His heart is His love, is His meekness, and so now that which approacheth and entereth into His anger is captivated in the anger. But it is possible to go out of the anger, as His dear heart is generated in the anger, which stilleth the anger and is rightly called the Kingdom of Heaven." ("Three Principles," chap. 20, pars. 60 and 61.)

Go out! And how! "When the soul inclineth itself at all towards God's face and doth but a little imagine into God's love, then the Divine life becometh stirring." (Apology 1, par. 2, part 553.) And "then the anger of God sinks down from the soul and so it is released or delivered in the love spirit from pain and lives in God." ("Doctrine of Election," chap. 10, par. 102.) "Hold fast," said Gichtel in one of his letters, "to love in your imagination; nothing can take it from you but your own imagination. As soon as our imagination goes out of the love, darkness enters into the imagination, and the devil then has access." And again, "they knew from experience how easy it was to stumble and to fall by a thought from love into wrath, when the soul being plunged into a violent struggle has very hard work to recover its balance."

HYPNOTISM AND MESMERISM.

By G. WYLD, M.D.

With reference to the interesting remarks by "C. C. M.," and "M.A. (Oxon.)," in recent numbers of "LIGHT," on the sensibility accompanying the hypnotic state, I should like to make a few observations, and first let me ask—

What is the hypnotic state and wherein lies the distinction between hypnotism and mesmerism?

It seems to me that the hypnotic state is one more or less of self-entrancement, produced by fixing the mind on a point, and thus excluding all circumferential action. The mesmeric condition, as entrancement, is the same, and is likewise produced by the sensitive fixing his mind on the eye of the operator, as on a point; or it is produced by the monotonous manual action of the operator, paralysing as it were all circumferential mental action.

As an illustration: the Oriental fakirs produce self-entrancement by fixing their eyes on the tip of the nose or on the navel, the ears, at the same time, sometimes being closed by the thumbs.

The self-entranced soul then acts independently; while, on the other hand, the sensitives mesmerically entranced become the mediums for the will of the operator.

Both states are states of more or less entrancement, but what is entrancement?

Entrancement is a state in which the soul or mind or ego has more or less left the body—so that the body can be cut to pieces without experiencing pain; because the ego is outside, and is acting independently of the senses, as an autozoetic power, clairaudient and clairvoyant, and at times controlling its vacant body automatically.

What is the difference between trance and ordinary sleep? I conceive it to be one of degree, which I have attempted to shew by a diagram in my book on Theosophy, which diagram I beg now to reproduce.

This diagram is a modification of one I got from my friend, the late John Dove, about 1840, and I may add that Mr. Dove's knowledge, experience, and power in mesmerism, much exceeded that of any man I have known.

This diagram illustrates what I mean by the relative position of soul and spirit and sleep and trance.

A B C D below the line × × represent the soul in its various states of vigilance at A; reasoning faculty at B; imagination at C; reverie and abstraction at D.

This state of abstraction immediately precedes the plunge which the soul takes into sleep at the point × at which point, namely at dead sleep, the soul and spirit are separated by "the middle wall of partition," the "river of oblivion" × ×

The soul may rest in this oblivious sleep, but if it cross the line it awakes on the other side in the spirit world as a spirit.

As a spirit it may ascend no higher than D', namely, the region of spirit reverie or abstraction.

But, if the soul as a spirit ascend to C', it becomes clairvoyant, and if it ascend to B' it exists as a reasoning spirit, and if it aspire and ascend to A' it becomes one with the Divine.

This diagram illustrates the mystic saying "As above, so below."

When the soul is in the region of reverie at D below the line, or as spirit in the region of reverie at D' above the line, it is readily controlled by spirits or by the mesmerist, and acts the folly or madness called electro-biology; and I conceive this is the region from which emanate most of the phenomena of modern Spiritualism, and it is to a great extent a region of confusion, and delusion, and lies. I have said the condition of electro-biology is one of temporary madness, induced by the mesmerist, and this may suggest how many cases of permanent madness may be produced by bioligising spirits.

The region of spirit clairvoyance C' is also the region of prophetic dreams.

To be in high trance is "to be dead in the flesh but alive in the spirit," the soul being then, if holy, in a state of actual regeneration by the Holy Spirit.*

But as "spiritual things can only be spiritually discerned," all remembrance of this heaven is forgotten, except, it may be, as a faint dream, on the soul's return to waking life. But some have remembered, and have said, "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive" the glory of the beatific life.

As to the sensibility of sleeping children alluded to by "C. C. M.," I believe this will depend on the depth of the child's sleep. If the child be "dead asleep," I believe there will rarely be any sensibility manifested, but if the child be in "light sleep," or if the child be in a condition of Spirit reverie as at D', then it may be conscious of mesmeric passes.

When the soul is in its normal state of vigilance, it can resist mesmerism, but if it submit and pass to the region of soul reverie at D below the line, or pass still further as in light trance to D' above the line, then the will of the mesmerist becomes the will of the sensitive, as in electro-biology, and as in sympathy of mental sensation, and touch, and hearing, and seeing. Then the sensitive becomes the medium for the will of the operator, just as the semi-entranced spirit medium is the victim of the obsessing spirit.

It will be thus seen that I regard mesmerism as the action of mind on mind, of which we have an illustration in "Mind-transference" or in the "Willing Game."

But is there such a thing as the mesmeric aura? Sensitives have often said that they see lights of various colours emanating from mesmerists, and they say that certain individuals have distinctive colours. They also declare that they experience sensations hot or cold, pleasant or disagreeable, as emanating from the fingers of the operators, and for myself, I have when mesmerising, often experienced pricking sensations as of something streaming from the tips of my fingers, and sensitives have generally concurred in giving my aura a distinctive colour; and it must be remembered that there may be colours both above and below the range of the spectrum, invisible to us but visible to sensitives.

I believe, then, that there is an aura; but I am still inclined to believe that it is not the aura chiefly which heals diseases, but I rather believe that it is the will, the desire, the sympathy, the love, which heals disease, and that the vibrations, so to speak, of these emotions are conveyed to the sensitive by a magnetic current, polarised by the will of the operator, much as the human voice can be conveyed to a distance along the ray of light in the photophone.

But what is the source of this magnetic aura and current?

For three years I have believed that the cohesive force in atoms, molecules, and masses was magnetic attraction, and that electricity, as the instrument of God's Will, was the substance of matter.

If so, then all chemical solution and mechanical fracture must be accompanied by a liberation of electricity or magnetism, and therefore the solution of food in the stomach, and the oxydation of the blood in the lungs, and the deoxydation of the blood in the concretion called nutrition, must be accompanied by a liberation of magnetism.

The blood is the life, and the healing power of magnetism is the vital magnetic emanation from this blood polarised and directed by the will, the desire, the love of the healer.

That it is the will and not the magnetism only which heals is shewn by the fact that passes made without the desire are not healing passes, and because it is also found that mesmerism is soothing or the reverse according to the mental character of the operator.

If, then, the healing is from the will and the blood, then those who in love, truth, and holiness magnetically heal diseases are thus so far Christ-like and may sometimes even be said to lay down their lives for others, but if wisdom be used there is no waste but rather that personal, cosmical, and spiritual circle of magnetic power "which blesses him who gives and him who takes."

* But parts of the body may be, independently of this entrancement, killed, as it were, for the time by the sensibility being driven out of the part by the mesmerist.

In the Times, 17th and 18th inst., will be found letters from Mr. Preece and Mr. Crookes, attempting to give a reason why the pulverised matter thrown into the higher atmosphere by the explosion in Java last August, may still, contrary to the law of gravity, be floating there, being magnetically repelled from the earth. This is the explanation I gave some weeks ago on reading Norman Lockyer's letter in the Times, on our recent sunsets, my theory of electricity being the cohesive force in matter having suggested to me this explanation.

EXPERIENCES IN SPIRITUALISM.

No. I.

By H. T. HUMPHREYS.

In proposing to give you some of my experiences in Spiritualism, I think it will probably be the best way to furnish a history of my acquaintance with, and study of, the subject.

It was not till the latter end of the year 1864 that I took any interest in Spiritualism. I had heard of it, but while I formed no opinion upon what I had heard, I never either sneered at it, or questioned the possibility of the phenomena. My previous knowledge of mesmerism prevented my doing this, but as I knew something of the mesmeric phenomena of clairvoyance, thought-reading, and prevision, what I said as to Spiritualism was that I could not see how the visits of spirits were proved by what had been told me, as mesmerism appeared to be sufficient to account for what I had heard.

It was then in the latter part of 1864 that an acquaintance, who has since passed from earth, came into my chambers and told me he was going to see the Davenport Brothers next day. He said he meant to be on the platform, and to expose them. He boasted that he had exposed every mesmerist whom he had come across. I told him that I was also going to see the Davenport Brothers on the next day, but that I much doubted that he would expose them, and I told him the history of a case of clairvoyance, which you have lately published in "LIGHT." On hearing it he told me, in terms which most men would have resented, that I was saying what was not true. However, we were at the Davenport sance next day, and my friend tied up one of the brothers. He tried to catch a hand which protruded from the hole in the cabinet, and was rewarded by a severe blow on the knuckles from the trumpet. After the cabinet sance, on being asked to state his opinion, he said, "I came here to expose the Davenport Brothers, but I am compelled to admit that I can expose nothing. So far as I am concerned, they have passed through the ordeal triumphantly."

Not very long after this occurrence, this gentleman came to my chambers, and said, "Humphreys! Spiritualism is a wonderful reality." He invited me to his apartments, where I was for the first time present at a sance, the medium being his sister-in-law. I then had communications from my sister, who had left this earth a few months previously. After this I sat with my wife, and had many communications, by tilting. I speedily discovered by indubitable tests, that the movements of the table were due to no muscular motion, and I held many sances with my wife, my sister, and nephew, and with personal friends, rarely failing to obtain answers by tilting, whenever I sat with anyone.

In these investigations I can truly say that my conviction of the truth of Spiritualism was wrought, not by what may be called phenomenal manifestations, but by the intelligence which was displayed from sources entirely outside of, and utterly uncontrollable by, any of those present in the body. I began to write under control, but after a time found that frequently the words I wrote passed through my mind as I wrote them, and I gave up trying to write.

At this time, Mrs. Milner Gibson used to hold weekly sances at her house near the Marble Arch, and Mr. S. C. Hall, by her permission, invited me to them. I arrived one evening after those who were sitting had closed the door of the inner room, but I went in there unbidden, and having spoken to Mrs. Milner Gibson, was about to leave, when a message was given directing the son of * * * * to come to the table. I had to admit that this was my spiritual name as given me at home, and I sat down. We received, during the sance, a message, which I took down, and which now lies before me, though I regret that it is undated. I gave a copy to Mrs. Milner Gibson. A spirit announced herself as Anna B., who when on earth had been known to Mrs. Milner Gibson. The message was as follows:—

"My earth-life was passed in error."

Some surprise was expressed by the hostess at this, but she said to me, "She was intellectual, and attended church" (her brother was a clergyman of the Established Church), "but I think it possible that she had no strong convictions of religion."

An explanation was asked for, and was thus given:—

"I did not believe in God's mercy, nor did I believe in the Lord's sacrifice. Oh! how this sin brought misery on me."

"But the Lord in mercy and love gave me the light that I anxiously sought for in my wretched darkness."

A gentleman who was present asked if the spirit would kindly explain what she meant by the words, "the Lord's sacrifice"? The reply was affirmative, and the following words were then given:—

"Why explain that which needs no explanation to those who search the Scripture with prayer?"

During the year 1865 I was sought out by P. M., an old acquaintance, who had been abroad as an officer in the navy, and he, finding that I was interested in the investigation of Spiritualism, came frequently to my chambers, where he sat with my wife and myself. On two occasions during that year I was told to go to places in town next day. In one of these it was stated that a deed was waiting for my signature, and by post next morning I had an intimation that it was so. In the other case I went to the office, as mentioned in the message, which had told me that A. F. P. wanted to see me, and when I walked in, he said, "I was just going to write to ask you to come."

A letter of mine was published in "LIGHT," No. 25, June 25th, 1881, in which I mentioned some facts which occurred in the presence of this friend, and I here recapitulate these, with one or two others.

On the first occasion of his sitting, which was with Mrs. Humphreys and myself, a spirit announced itself as G. A., an old college chum. He said: "If you are my old friend, G. A., you can tell me the name of a professor to whose rooms in ——— street we used often to go." The name, of which Mrs. Humphreys and I were ignorant, was spelled out (Christian and surname). He then asked for another name, which was at once correctly given. At his second sance his mother announced herself.

He asked her to tell her maiden name, which was given correctly. He then asked, "Where did you go to school?" "At L——." "Where were you married to my father?" "At B——." "Who married you?" "The Rev. Mr. E." He wrote that evening to his father and to his aunt to ask the same questions, as he did not know whether the answers were correct or not. He received a reply from his aunt which said, "Your mother went to school at L——. She was married at B——, by the Rev. Mr. J." He was much annoyed at this contradiction. On the next day he had a reply from his father. "I do not know where your mother was at school. We were married at B——, by the Rev. Mr. E., the curate, because the Rev. Mr. J——, the rector, was from home at the time."

On another occasion he was told at a sitting with me that his father had that evening written to him, enclosing a P.O. order. The letter did not arrive, but a day or two after he had a letter from his father asking him why he had not acknowledged the receipt of the P.O. order which he had forwarded.

On another occasion I was absent. He sat with Mrs. H., when he had a message from Anisi, a negro boy who had been taken from a slave dhow on the African Coast and had served him on board one of H.M.S. He had been suffering from lung disease, and had been left with some friends in the Cape Colony. His first message, after giving his name and stating, in the Galla language, that he was very glad to meet my friend again, was to tell him not to carry out an intention which he had formed, unknown to any one else. This advice was most distasteful to my friend. The message next spelt out was in Arabic, as follows:—

"Il Christ Allah, la Allah il Allah, Mohammed rasul Allah."

The last clause the spirit persistently adhered to.

The following is somewhat interesting. While sitting with my sister at her lodgings, on September 24th, 1865 we received the following message from a spirit who announced himself as Francis Hippolyte:—

"Life-like homes are here; we cannot get into them. Pray for my progress that I may be admitted into one of them."

I asked him if he had not heard of Jesus Christ? He professed utter ignorance even of the name. I told him that Jesus Christ had died to save him, and asked if he would join in prayer in His name. He answered affirmatively. I prayed, and he tilted the table in assent. He then left.

A few days later he again announced himself, and told me he had a house. He thanked me for my aid, and I have never since had any message from him.

It is, perhaps, right that I should say that during this period I had some very curious communications, not unlike some of which certain of your correspondents have told. Most of these were false. I had communications purporting to come from St. Paul, the Virgin Mary, Thomas à Becket (who was very noisy, and at times thumped about the room), and others. My friend, while we were sitting in perfect darkness, would seize a pencil and write a message—in English, Greek, or Latin it might be, but perfectly unknown to him till the gas was turned up. A young lady and myself had our hands on a Planchette, and three attempts were made to write the name of Felice Orsini, with whom she had been acquainted. The third only was successful.

"THE BROTHERS" OF THEOSOPHY.

The following paper was read by Mr. Sinnett at a recent private gathering of Theosophists and their friends:—

I have put down on paper the few remarks I want to make this evening, in order that some views connected with the Theosophical Society may be presented for your consideration in a systematic way.

All persons who become interested in any of the teachings which have found their way out into the world through the intermediation of the Theosophical Society very soon turn to the sanctions on which those teachings rest.

Now the orthodox occult reply hitherto given to inquirers as to the authenticity of any small statements in occult science that have hitherto been put forth, has simply been this:—"Ascertain for yourself." That is to say, lead the pure spiritual life, cultivate the inner faculties, and by degrees these will be awakened and developed to the extent of enabling you to probe Nature for yourself. But that advice is not of a kind which great numbers of people have ever been ready to take, and hence knowledge concerning the truths of occult science has remained in the hands of a few.

A new departure has now been taken. Certain proficients in occult science have broken through the old restrictions of their order, and have suddenly let out a flood of statements into the world, together with some information concerning the attributes and faculties they have themselves acquired, and by means of which they have learned what they now tell us.

It is very widely recognised that the teaching is interesting and coherent, and even supported by analogies, but every new inquirer in turn must ask what assurance can we have that the persons from whom this teaching emanates, are in a position to ascertain so much. Most people, I think, would be ready to admit that persons invested, as the Brothers of Theosophy are said to be invested, with abnormal and extraordinary powers over Nature—even in the departments of Nature with which we are familiar—may very probably have faculties which enable them to obtain a deep insight into many of the generally hidden truths of Nature. But then comes the primary question, "What assurance can you give us that there really are behind the few people who stand forward as the visible representatives of the Theosophical Society, any such persons as the Adept Brothers at all?" This is an old question which is always recurring, and which must go on recurring as long as new comers continue to approach the threshold of the Theosophical Society. For many of us it has long been settled; for some new inquirers the existence of psychological Adepts seems so probable that the assurances of the leading representatives of the Society in India are readily accepted; but for others, again, the existence of the Brothers must first be established by altogether plain and unequivocal evidence before it will seem worth while to pay attention to the report some of us may make as to the specific doctrine they teach.

I propose, therefore, to go over the evidence on this main question, which certainly underlies any with which the Theosophical Society, so far as it is concerned with the Indian teachings, can be engaged. Of course, I am not going to trouble you with any repetition of particular incidents already described in published writings. What I propose to do is briefly to review the whole case as it now stands, very greatly enlarged and strengthened as it has been during the last two years. The evidence, to begin with, divides itself into two kinds. First, we have the general body of current belief, which in India goes to show that such persons as Mahatmas or Adepts are somewhere in existence; secondly, the specific evidence which shows that the leaders of the Theosophical Society are in relation with, and in the confidence of, such Adepts.

As to the general body of belief, it would hardly be too much to say that the whole mass of the sacred literature of India rests on belief in the existence of Adepts; and a very widely-spread belief, covering great areas of space and time, can rarely be regarded as evolved from nothing,—as having had no basis of fact. But passing over the Mahabharata and the Puranas and all they tell us concerning "Rishis" or Adepts of ancient date, I may call your attention to a paper in the Theosophist of May, 1882, on some relatively modern popular Indian books, recounting the lives of various "Sadhus," another word for saint, yogee, or adept, who have lived within the last thousand years. In this article a list is given of over seventy such persons, whose memory is enshrined in a number of Marathi books, where the "miracles" they are said to have wrought are recorded. The historical value of these narratives may, of course, be disputed. I mention them merely as illustrations of the fact that belief in the persons having the powers now ascribed to the Brothers is no new thing in India. And next we have the testimony of many modern writers concerning the very remarkable occult feats of Indian yogees and fakirs. Such people, of course, are immeasurably below the psychological rank of those whom we speak of as Brothers, but the faculties they possess, sometimes, will be enough to convince anyone who studies the evidence concerning them, that living men can acquire powers and faculties commonly regarded as super-human.

In Jaccotot's books about his experiences in Benares and elsewhere, this subject is fully dealt with, and some facts connected with it have even forced their way into Anglo-Indian official records. The report of an English Resident at the court of Runjeet Singh describes how he was present at the burial of a yogee who was shut up in a vault, by his own consent, for a considerable period, six weeks, I think, but I have not got the report at hand just now to quote in detail—and emerged alive, at the end of that time, which he had spent in Samadhi or trance. Such a man would, of course, be an "Adept" of a very inferior type, but the record of his achievements has the advantage of being very well authenticated as far as it goes. Again, up to within a few years ago, a very highly spiritualised ascetic and gifted seer was living at Agra, where he taught a group of disciples and by their own statement has frequently re-appeared amongst them since his death. This event itself was an effort of will accomplished at an appointed time. I have heard a good deal about him from one of his principal followers, a cultivated and highly respected native Government official, now living at Allahabad. His existence and the fact that he possessed great psychological gifts, are quite beyond question.

Thus, in India, the fact that there are such people in the world as Adepts is hardly regarded as open to dispute. Most of those, of course, concerning whom one can obtain definite information, turn out on inquiry to be yogees of the inferior type, men who have trained their inner faculties to the extent of possessing various abnormal powers, and even insight into spiritual truths. But none the less do all inquiries after Adepts superior to them in attainments provoke the reply that certainly there are such though they live in complete seclusion. The general vague, indefinite belief, in fact, paves the way to the inquiry with which we are more immediately concerned,—whether the leaders of the Theosophical Society are really in relation with some of the higher Adepts who do not habitually live amongst the community at large, nor make known the fact of their adeptship to any but their own regularly accepted pupils.

Now the evidence on this point divides itself as follows:—

First, we have the primary evidence of witnesses who have personally seen certain of these Adepts, both in the flesh and out of the flesh, who have seen their powers exercised, and who have obtained certain knowledge as to their existence and attributes.

Secondly, the evidence of those who have seen them in the astral form, identifying them in various ways with the living men others have seen.

Thirdly, the testimony of those who have acquired circumstantial evidence as to their existence.

Foremost among the witnesses of the first group stand Madame Blavatsky and Colonel Olcott themselves. For those who see reason to trust Madame Blavatsky, her testimony is, of course, ample and precise, and altogether satisfactory. She has lived among the Adepts for many years. She has been in almost daily communication with them ever since. She has returned to them, and they have visited her in their natural bodies on several occasions since she emerged from Tibet after her own initiation. There is no intermediate alternative between the conclusion that her statements concerning the Brothers are broadly true, and the conclusion that she is what some American enemies have called her, "the champion impostor of the age." I am aware of the theory which some Spiritualists entertain to the effect that she may be a medium controlled by spirits whom she mistakes for living men, but this theory can only be held by people who are quite inattentive to nine-tenths of the statement she makes, not to speak yet of the testimony of others. How can she have lived under the roof of certain persons in Tibet for seven years and more, seeing them and their friends and relations going about the business of their daily lives, instructing her by slow degrees in the vast science to which she is devoted, and be in any doubt as to whether they are living men or spirits? The conjecture is absurd. She is either speaking falsely when she tells us that she has so lived among them, or the Adepts who taught her are living men. The Spiritualists' hypothesis about her supposed "controls" is built upon the statement she makes that the Adepts appear to her in the astral form when she is at a distance from them. If they had never appeared to her in any other form, there would be room to argue the matter from the Spiritualists' point of view, or there might be, but for other circumstances again. But her astral visitors are identical in all respects with the men she has lived and studied amongst. At intervals, as I have said, she has been enabled to go back again and see them in the flesh. Her astral communication with them merely fills up the gap of her personal intercourse with them, which has extended over a long series of years. Her veracity may, of course, be challenged, though I think it can be shown that it is most unreasonable to challenge this, but we might as reasonably doubt the living reality of our nearest relations, of the people we live amongst most intimately, as suppose that Madame Blavatsky can be herself mistaken in describing the Brothers as living men. Either she must be right, or she has consciously been weaving an enormous network of falsehood in all her writings, acts and conversation for the last eight or nine years. And the plea that she may be a loose talker and given to exaggeration will no more meet the difficulty than the Spiritualists' hypothesis. Pare away as much as you like from the details of Madame Blavatsky's statement on account of possible exaggeration, and that which remains is a great solid block of residual statement which must be either true or a structure of conscious falsehood. And even if Madame Blavatsky's testimony stood alone, we should have the wonderful fact of her total self-sacrifice in the cause of Theosophy to make the hypothesis of her being a conscious impostor one of the most extravagant that could be entertained. At first when we in India who specially became her friends, pointed this out, people said, "But how do you know she had anything to sacrifice? she may have been an adventurer from the beginning." We proved this conjecture, as I have fully explained in my preface to the second edition of the "Occult World," and from some of the foremost people in Russia, her relations and affectionate friends, came abundant assurances of her personal identity. If she had not given up her life to Occultism she might have spent it in luxury among her own people, and in fact as a member of the aristocratic class.

Difficult as the hypothesis of her imposture thus becomes, we next find it in flagrant incompatibility with all the facts of Colonel Olcott's life. As undeniably as in the case of Madame Blavatsky he has forsaken a life of worldly prosperity to lead the theosophical life, under circumstances of great physical self-denial, in India. And he also tells us that he has seen the Brothers both in the flesh and in the astral form. By a long series of the most astounding thaumaturgic displays when he was first introduced to the subject in America, he was made acquainted with their powers. He has been visited at Bombay by the living man, his own special master, with whom he had first become acquainted by seeing him in the astral form in America. His life, for years, has been surrounded with the abnormal occurrences which Spiritualists again will sometimes conjecture—so wildly—to be Spiritualism, but which all hinge on to that continuous chain of relationship with the Brothers, which for Colonel Olcott has been partly a matter of occult phenomena and partly a matter of waking intercourse between man and man. Again, in reference to Colonel Olcott, as in reference to Madame Blavatsky, I assert, fearlessly, that there is no compromise possible between the extravagant assumption that he is consciously lying in all he says about the Brothers, and the assumption that what he says establishes the existence of the Brothers as a broad fact, for remember that Colonel Olcott has now been a co-worker of Madame Blavatsky's, and in constant intimate association with her for eight years. The notion that she has been able to deceive him all this while by fraudulent tricks, apart from its monstrosity in other ways, is too unreasonable to be entertained. Colonel Olcott, at all events, knows whether Madame Blavatsky is fraudulent or genuine, and he has given up his whole life to the service of the cause she represents in testimony of his conviction that she is genuine. Again the spiritualistic hypothesis comes into play. Madame Blavatsky may be a medium whose presence surrounds Colonel Olcott with phenomena; but then she is herself deceived by astral influences as to the true nature of the Brothers who are the head and front of the whole phenomenal display, and we have already seen reason, I think, to reject that hypothesis as absurd. There is no logical escape from the conclusion that things are broadly as she and Colonel Olcott say, or they are both conscious impostors, rival champions of the age in this respect, both sacrificing everything that worldly-minded people live for, to revel in this life-long imposture which brings them nothing but hard living and hard words.

But the case for the authenticity of their statement, far from ending here, may in one sense be said to begin here. Our native Indian witnesses now come to the front. First Damodar, of whom the well-known writer of "Hints on Esoteric Theosophy" speaks as follows in that pamphlet:—

"You specially in a former letter referred to Damodar, and you asked how it could be believed that the Brothers would waste time with a half-educated slip of a boy like him, and yet absolutely refuse to visit and convince men like — and — Europeans of the highest education and marked abilities. But do you know that this slip of a boy has deliberately given up high caste, family and friends, and an ample fortune, all in pursuit of the truth? That he has for years lived that pure, unworldly, self-denying life which we are told is essential to direct intercourse with the Brothers? 'Oh a monomaniac' you say, 'Of course he sees anything and everything.' But do not you see whither this leads you? Men who do not lead the life do not obtain direct proof of the existence of the Brothers. A man does lead the life and avers that he has obtained such proof, and you straightway call him a monomaniac and refuse his testimony . . . quite a 'heads I win, tails you lose' sort of position."

Damodar has seen some of the Brothers visit the headquarters of the Society in the flesh. He has repeatedly been visited by them in the astral shape. He has himself gone through certain initiations; he has acquired very considerable powers, for he has been rapidly developed as regards these, expressly that he might be an additional link of connection, independently of Madame Blavatsky, between the Brothers, his masters, and the Theosophical Society. The whole life he leads is impressive testimony to the fact that he also knows the reality of the Brothers. On any other hypothesis we must include Damodar in the conscious imposture supposed to be carried on by Madame Blavatsky, for he has been her intimate associate and devoted assistant, sharing her meals, doing her work, living under her roof at Bombay for several years.

Shall we, then, rather than believe in the Brothers, accept the hypothesis that Madame Blavatsky, Colonel Olcott, and Damodar, are a band of conscious impostors? In that case Ramaswamy has to be accounted for. Ramaswamy is a very respectable, educated, English speaking native of Southern India, in Government service as a registrar of a court in Tinnevely, I believe. I have met him several times. First, to indicate the course of his experience in a few words,—he sees the astral form of Madame Blavatsky's Guru, at Bombay; then he gets clairaudient communication with him, while many hundred miles away from all the Theosophists, at his own home in the South of India. Then he travels in obedience to that voice to Darjeeling; then he plunges wildly into the Sikkim jungles in search of the Guru, whom he has reason to believe in that neighbourhood, and after various adventures meets him,—the same man he has seen before in astral shape, the same man whose portrait Colonel Olcott has, and whom he has seen, the living speaker of the voice that has been leading him on from Southern India. He has a long interview with him, a waking, open-air, daylight interview, with a living man, and returns his devoted chela as he is at this moment, and assuredly ever will be. Yet his master who called him from Tinnevely and received him in Sikkim, is of those who on the spiritualistic hypothesis are Madame Blavatsky's spirit controls.

Two more witnesses who personally know the Brothers next come to me at Simla, in the persons of two regular chelas who have been sent across the mountains on some business, and are ordered en passant to visit me and tell me about their master, my Adept correspondent. These men had just come, when I first saw them, from living with the Adepts. One of them, Dhabagiri Nath, visited me several days running, talked to me for hours about Koot Hoomi, with whom he had been living for ten years, and impressed me and one or two others who saw him as a very earnest, devoted, and trustworthy person. Later on, during his visit to India, he was associated with many striking occult phenomena directed to the satisfaction of native inquirers. He, of course, must be a false witness, invented to prop up Madame Blavatsky's vast imposture, if he is anything else than the chela of Koot Hoomi that he declares himself to be.

Another native, Mohini, soon after this begins to get direct communication from Koot Hoomi independently altogether of Madame Blavatsky, and when hundreds of miles away from her. He also becomes a devoted adherent to the Theosophical cause; but Mohini must, as far as I am aware, be ranked in the second group of our witnesses, those who have had personal astral communication with the Brothers, but have not yet seen them in flesh.

Bhavani Rao, a young native candidate for chelaship, who came once in company with Colonel Olcott, but at a time when Madame Blavatsky was in another part of India, to see me at Allahabad, and spent two nights under our roof there, is another witness who has had independent communication with Koot Hoomi, and more than that, who is able himself to act as a link of communication between Koot Hoomi and the outer world. For during the visit I speak of, he was enabled to pass a letter of mine to the master, to receive back his reply, to get off a second note of mine, and to receive back a little note of a few words in reply again. I do not mean that he did all this of his own power, but that his magnetism was such as to enable Koot Hoomi to do it through him. The experience is valuable because it affords a striking illustration of the fact that Madame Blavatsky is not an essential intermediary in the correspondence between myself and my revered friend. Other illustrations are afforded by the frequent passage of letters between Koot Hoomi and myself through the mediation of Damodar at Bombay, at a time when both Madame Blavatsky and Colonel Olcott were away at Madras, travelling about on a Theosophical tour, in the course of which their presence at various places was constantly mentioned in the local papers. I was at Allahabad, and I used, during that time, to send my letters for Koot Hoomi to Damodar at Bombay, and occasionally receive replies so promptly that it would have been impossible for these to have been furnished by Madame Blavatsky, then four or more days further from me in the course of post than Bombay.

In this way, my very voluminous correspondence is, demonstrably as regards portions of it, and therefore by irresistible inference as regards the whole, not the work of Madame Blavatsky, or Colonel Olcott; which, if the Brothers are not a reality, it must be. The correspondence is visible on paper, a considerable mass of it. How has it come into existence; reaching me at different places and times, and in different countries, and through different people? I do not quite understand what hypotheses can be framed by a non-believer in the Brothers about my correspondence. I can think of none which are not at once negated by some of the facts about it.

It would be useless to copy out from statements that from time to time have been published in the Theosophist, the names of native witnesses who have seen the astral forms of the Brothers—spectral shapes which they were informed were such—about the headquarters of the Society at Bombay. Quite a cloud of witnesses would testify to such experiences, and I myself, I may add, saw such an appearance on one occasion at the Society's present headquarters in Madras. But, of course, it might be suggested of such appearances that they were spiritualistic. On the other hand, in that case the argument travels back to the considerations already pointed out, which show that the occult phenomena surrounding Madame Blavatsky cannot be Spiritualism. They can be, in fact, nothing but what we who know her intimately and are now closely identified with the Society, believe them to be with full conviction, viz., manifestations of the abnormal psychological powers of those whom we speak of as the Brothers.

"YES" OR "NO."

The following letter appeared in several of last Monday's London daily papers. Perhaps some of our readers can assist Mr. Gurney in the matter:—

"SIR,—The Society for Psychical Research has collected a very large number of cases where some marked event—usually either death or serious danger—happening to a person at a distance has coincided either with the apparent perception by some friend or relative of that person's bodily presence, or with an exceptionally vivid and haunting dream of him. The reality of these coincidences is beyond dispute, and their number, also, is far greater than any one can be at all aware of who has not taken special pains to procure first-hand evidence of them. It may, however, be argued that the coincidence, though real, is in every case due to chance. Now, the force of this argument must clearly depend on the frequency of hallucinations of the senses, or of this particular sort of haunting dream, among sane and healthy persons.

"If they fall to the lot of every one, or nearly every one, then their total number must be enormous; according to the law of chances, it might naturally happen that one of them here and there would fall on the same day or night as the real event. If, on the other hand, such experiences are comparatively rare, then the cases which have been simultaneous with the actual event form too large a proportion of the whole number for the coincidence to be attributable to chance. For the decision of this point, it is of fundamental importance to ascertain how far the number of those who have not had these experiences exceeds the number of those who have had them. An accurate result is far from easy to obtain, however wide the range of inquiry be made; for those who have nothing of positive interest to relate are naturally less communicative than those whose experience has been to some extent remarkable. For our purpose it is, of course, essential to obtain the due proportion of negative answers; and with this object we have framed our inquiries in such a manner as to require no answer but 'Yes' or 'No.' The questions to which we are desirous of obtaining a very large number of such monosyllabic replies are—

"1. Hallucinations.—Have you ever, when in good health and completely awake, had a distinct impression of seeing or being touched by a human being, or of hearing a voice or sound which suggested a human presence, when no one was there?"

"2. Dreams.—Can you recall that you have ever in the course of the last ten years, when in good health, had a dream of the death of some person known to you (about whom you were not anxious at the time), which dream you marked as an exceptionally vivid one, and of which the distressing impression lasted for as long as an hour after you rose in the morning?"

"If any reader of this letter, in the course of the next six months, will repeat these two questions verbatim to twenty, fifty, one hundred or more trustworthy persons, from whom he does not know which answer to expect, and who have not already been interrogated by someone else, and if he will communicate the result, these will be most gratefully received and acknowledged, and he would render further aid by inducing others to do the same. In any case where a vivid impression or dream has coincided with the real event, it is particularly requested that the person who has had this experience will send me an independent account of it. In every other case where the answer is affirmative, a simple 'Yes' will be sufficient; but I should desire to have (not for publication) the name and address of any person who answers 'Yes,' as well as of the collector. In case of negative answers, it will be sufficient if the collector will send (not for publication) his own name and address, with the words, 'Hallucinations, twenty noes;' 'Dreams, one hundred noes,' or whatever it may be, on a post-card.

Hair Growing on Plaster Casts.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Even before reading the interesting communication of "C. C. M." in your last issue, I had been told of another case of hair growing on a plaster cast. But the sculptor who has taken the cast he has shewn me avers that in the very great many taken by him, this alone has exhibited the extraordinary phenomenon; nor has he ever heard of a similar case.

The hair in the cast I have seen has even grown in the cavity of the nose, and on a mole on the cheek. But whether the strange occurrence be repeated or not, unless it be scientifically explained as a physical fact I do not see why it should not be attributed to spiritual agency.—Yours very truly,

Physical Manifestations.

SIR,—I find in an article by Mr. Peter Lee, in "LIGHT," November 10th, the following:—"I furnished you with my experience of the folly of attempting to get satisfactory physical manifestations in promiscuous or crowded circles." It may be of advantage to investigators to state what I have witnessed in "promiscuous circles." To be sure, there was in no instance a crowd, as the room we occupied was very large and the number of attendants did not average, I think, over twenty. For seven consecutive evenings, no matter what the weather might be or how varied the character of the attendants, fully materialised forms appeared to the number of ten or a dozen. These consisted of white persons and Indians, men, women, and children. The last one who generally came, and always addressed us in a kind fatherly manner, was a Mr. Brown. He was quite tall and well dressed, and was recognised by his son, who was generally present. We were favoured also, invariably I think, with the presence of an Indian girl, Honto, who came close to us, danced slowly and gracefully, and made long shawls of very delicate lace (seemingly) as she danced. Often a little woman came who was recognised by her daughter, who was a boarder in the house where the manifestations took place, and who stood at her side and said to the audience: "This is my mother."

The country house, the room, the various scenes so well depicted by Colonel Olcott in his "People from the Other World," as also the face and figure of the medium, the country farmer, William Eddy, I need not enlarge upon, as they are those referred to above and to which the Colonel has done full justice.

With the Fox sisters, at my own house, when some of the sitters were somewhat rude in character (though this was only once or twice allowed), the manifestations were noisy and boisterous. It was easy to see the cause. In forty other sittings with these distinguished mediums, harmony reigned, flowers were brought from my garden (all doors and windows being closed), the guitar was played upon (an illuminated hand being seen, in one instance, sweeping over the chords), a portrait was drawn, and we were favoured with many pages of direct spirit writing—all in the dark. But these are only a few of the marvellous manifestations accorded to us in the sittings referred to.

Another article in "LIGHT" informs us that the writer had had the power of seeing the interior framework of a human body and its organs in action, they being illumined from within. One night, when my wife was suffocating with diphtheria, I applied my hand to her throat, and after a while quite relieved her. During the application of the hand (which was probably accompanied by a strong will power and prayer), I saw for an instant an ethereal finger moving over the part affected. The throat was transparent to my spiritual perceptibility.

The Shropshire "Mystery."

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—There is one aspect in which the case of the mediumistic Shropshire girl presents itself to my mind, which seems to have been overlooked by Spiritualists, and that is the splendid opportunity it furnishes for spiritualistic propaganda in the district in which the phenomena have occurred. It appears that the greatest excitement, even yet, prevails there on the subject, and we are told that at the White Horse Inn, Wem, animated discussions upon the matter have nightly taken place. Indeed, the Standard has assured us that the people in the quarter where the girl lived are divided into two parties, one holding that the manifestations were spiritual, and the other that they were mere imposture; and violent quarrels, we are informed, ensue when the subject is broached. The Psychical Society have made an application to be permitted to investigate the case, but they do not appear to have met with any encouragement. It was probably feared that a full and careful examination into the affair would be too much of an exposure of the methods adopted to extort a confession from the poor girl, even to the seeking by one of those hocus-pocus reporters from London to betray the child, Judas-like, with a kiss. But nobody can prevent a spiritualistic lecturer going over to Wem, and there delivering a discourse explaining the true rationale of the strange occurrences. I firmly believe that such a lecture delivered there at the present time would do an immense amount of good, the more, probably, because it would be pretty sure to be reported fully in the local Press, and, perhaps, under the circumstances, in the London newspapers also; and a new impetus might be given to Spiritualism. If Spiritualists took as much advantage of occasions favourable to their cause as their opponents do of others which are or appear unfavourable to it, the glorious triumph which they desire and believe to be its final destiny would be brought materially nearer. Who knows but that the furniture movings and stone throwings in the little village in Shropshire may prove, like the rappings in the obscure hamlet of Rochester, the commencement of a new era for Spiritualism? But this may depend on whether the Spiritualists of England avail themselves of the former as those of America did of the latter, as an occasion for advancing the spread of their principles. Many Spiritualists act almost as though they believed about Spiritualism as the Quietists did about conversion, that because a work is spiritual it needs not about conversion, that because a work is spiritual it needs not and must not have human co-operation. But surely the spirits desire us to co-operate with them, and that we should be the almoners of the bread of life, which thousands, weary of the barren husks of conventional doctrine, are famishing for. And never was there a time when the comfort derived from belief in Spiritualism would have come as a more consoling and brightening influence than it would come now to myriads of hearts— hearts crushed down with the weight of despair and misery which the poverty caused by the present industrial depression has brought upon them. Let Spiritualists be up and doing, remembering that the injunction given by St. Paul to Christians has equal application to themselves—faith without works is dead.

—I am, Sir, yours truly,

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M.A. (Oxon.)"

Mr. Labouchere is vexed because Mr. Gurney is inciting people to ask questions on psychical matters. He sincerely trusts that people will not "pester all their acquaintances" in the way suggested. By way, apparently, of avoiding cross-examination, Mr. Labouchere volunteers such evidence as he has to give. It is not much, and leads but to a lame and impotent conclusion. He took, once upon a time, a lease of a house near Piccadilly, the last occupier of which had cut his throat in the drawing room, "a matter of absolute indifference to me," as Mr. Labouchere characteristically remarks. "I generally sat in a room on the ground floor, and late at night I used to hear all the crockery and pots and pans in the basement rattling as though some one were pushing them about. After this a step, as of a heavy person, would slowly advance from the basement up to the top of the house. At first I thought it was a robber, and went down into the kitchen, but having done this once or twice, and finding no one, I occupied myself no further with these strange noises. Well, the curious thing was that I learned that the servants also heard the steps of what they were pleased to call the ghost. I suppose there was some natural cause for these noises, though I did not discover it." Was ever such lame stuff! Mr. Labouchere was incurious enough to leave a curious problem untouched; therefore, all the rest of the world must do the same! He "supposes there was some natural cause" for what he did not care to probe. Therefore, the numberless records of a similar character are to go for nothing, and we are to cease our researches. On this principle all investigation into the unknown and unexplored regions which science is constantly penetrating should be abandoned. The conclusion of a "natural," indeed, but not a natural or even a rational conclusion.

A journal of a very different calibre—the Lancet—is also sorely distressed that any encouragement should be given to what it has decided to be hallucination. The whole paragraph is worth placing on record. The arrogant tone, the calm assumptions, the Pharisaic boast of exclusive possession of the key of knowledge, and not least the impotence which drags in an appeal to moral sanctions to prevent what it fears, are extremely suggestive. Here is the paragraph:—

"A body calling itself 'The Society for Psychical Research,' [and why not? I ask parenthetically, without the permission of a paper calling itself the Lancet] 'is addressing a series of what must surely be serio-comic interrogatories to the public in relation to 'hallucinations' and 'dreams.' An invitation is thrown out to all the weak-minded people who think they have seen 'ghosts' or 'spectres,' or been 'touched' by mysterious shades, and to all the dreamers who dream dreams of the nature of 'coincidences,' to state their experiences. Here is a grand opportunity for the mad folk outside Bedlam. If it were not for the trouble involved, we should like to peruse the mass of 'communications' these invitations will be certain to call forth. There are, however, two preliminary questions which ought to be asked. First, has any 'society' of presumably sane men a moral right to instigate the crazy public to formulate its 'mysterious' experiences? We know that the most disastrous consequences sometimes ensue to weak brains from dwelling too intently on subjects of the nature of 'fixed ideas.' It is, therefore, doubtful whether this sort of thing ought to be allowed. No sober-minded person can doubt that all impressions of seeing, or hearing, or feeling spiritual manifestations must be morbid. Such things exist only in the imaginations of the persons who are subject to them."

"Has any society a moral right to instigate the crazy public?"—"crazy" is a good word well slipped in—"to formulate its mysterious experiences!" Suppose we put it the other way. Has any journal a right to use its influence to keep men on the dead level of a blank materialism, and to close the avenues of spirit whereby man may gain glimpses of his own true nature, and of the realm of spirit in which even now he dwells? It is unworthy of the Lancet, which has been honourably distinguished on more than one occasion for its recognition of something in man that is not mere matter, to write in this hysterical style. So flurried is the writer that he has forgotten his second question altogether: but if it were anything like the first, that is not of much consequence.

To turn, however, from these unworthy utterances, I hope that the readers of "LIGHT" will do what they can to make this census a wide and complete one. Its value depends, as Mr. Gurney points out, on the width of the area covered; and the opportunity, which lies ready to our hands now, if lost, will not recur. It is not a serious demand on time, and readers of "LIGHT" must, at any rate, appreciate the importance of what they are asked to do. At the risk then of coming upon some who will be cantankerous, I ask my readers to get their fifty replies to the following questions and to send them, as requested, to Edmund Gurney, Esq., Hon. Sec., S.P.R., 14, Dean's-yard, S.W.:—

"1. Hallucinations.—Have you ever, when in good health and completely awake, had a distinct impression of seeing or being touched by a human being, or of hearing a voice or sound which suggested a human presence, when no one was there?"

"2. Dreams.—Can you recall that you have ever in the course of the last ten years, when in good health, had a dream of the death of some person known to you (about whom you were not anxious at the time), which dream you marked as an exceptionally vivid one, and of which the distressing impression lasted for as long as an hour after you rose in the morning?"

The Warden of Keble College, Oxford, contributes to the Pall Mall Gazette (December 18th) an interesting paper on "Quietism," apropos of a book to which I have already referred in these Notes—"The Golden Book of Molinos." After a graceful compliment to Mr. Shorthouse, he sets himself to find out what Quietism has to offer to an age, one of the dominant notes of which is hurry, push, competition, strife, in one or other of their Protean forms. In similar epochs, though the stress has never been so great as it is now, men have found peace and repose of spirit in a recognition of a neglected side of their nature. To go aside from the din of strife, especially of theological strife, from hair-splitting over the letter that killeth to the inbreathing of the Spirit that giveth life, was true rest of soul. The inward communion of the soul with God, and the accessibility to all of this spiritual refreshment—these were the cardinal doctrines of Quietism. They are, in their own way, medicinal of the ills that our poor souls inherit and propagate in this age of hurry-scurry and superficial practicality. For, as Mr. Talbot well points out, many a soul, nurtured on the husks of external form, is starved in the midst of its ceaseless round of religious ceremony. The development of the Ego is not compassed by any such means. Growth comes from within: the spirit is nurtured by the things of spirit, and man grows as much by meditation and prayer, as he does by leading the active life of piety and good works. "Life and strength may be gone before, by the complicated roads of evidence from result, we reach the truths to which no doubt ultimately they converge. Thought may be dissipated into a number of aperçus. We may be always abroad, collecting, observing, organising, and acting: never at home, musing, realising, imbibing, and being." . . . "The Quietist corrects and calms our practical ways by his serene concentration on the one thing needful: he makes us aware of the confusion and blindness of the life immersed in detail. He shews us that though we may be learning much, and doing much, we have forfeited our most imperial endowment unless we see through all learning and doing to a central Being and Thought and Purpose, which is the true One in the many." Mr. Talbot's paper does not bear condensation, but it amply repays study.

With this number the third year of "LIGHT" closes. A retrospect of the year now passing will be found in another column. Here I may perhaps be permitted to refer with some satisfaction to the fact that these notes on current events connected with Spiritualism, and notices of books and facts old and new that have come under my view, have now issued in unbroken continuity during the whole of that time. My correspondence witnesses to the great kindness with which they have been received, and to the interest which their varied subject-matter has excited. They cannot pretend to any exhaustive treatment of even current events. For the Press is crowded with matter that ought to be at least referred to. Already the announcements of the January magazines shew that the supply will be maintained. I shall hope to utilise it hereafter.

Mrs. Oliphant is to give us another treat by contributing to Blackwood another "Story of the Seen and the Unseen," which is to deal with "the Higher Spiritualism." And the Bishop of Carlisle is to discuss "Apparitions" in the next number of The Contemporary. In the face of all this, the author of "Vice-Versâ" is discoursing in Longman's on "The Decay of the British Ghost." He does not make much out of it, and the ghost will not decay—bodies decay, by the way, not ghosts; like John Brown they "go marching on"—the ghost will go on in spite of the author of that topsy-turvy but most funny book. I cannot profess to find out all that I should notice. Perhaps any of my readers who catch me in the act of omission, will give practical proof of their approbation by sending the material to rectify it addressed "M.A. (Oxon.)," care of "LIGHT."

INDEX TO VOLUME III.—For the convenience of those of our readers who bind their sets of "LIGHT" we have prepared the usual index and title page for the volume which closes with the current number. This will probably be published in our next issue.

CLAIRVOYANCE IN DREAMS.

By ELIZA BOUCHER.

The following curious clairvoyant dream was experienced many years since by a fellow townsman of my own, whom I knew, though not intimately, as long as I can remember, and up to the time of her death. The account was given by the niece of the dreamer to my sister, who most kindly, knowing my interest in psychological subjects, sent it to me in writing, some few months since. I copy the narrative from her letter (which I have preserved) almost verbatim, but I am not at liberty to publish names, and will therefore call the clairvoyante Miss M., who, when young, was apprenticed to a milliner residing in a neighbouring town. The latter had for sale a handsome lace veil, price £5, which, being unable to dispose of it, she determined to put up for a raffle. So numbers were fixed on, and a list prepared accordingly. Whilst the affair was pending, Miss M. told the principal that she had dreamt of having taken a certain number which she had seen over a Miss L.'s seat in a Dissenting chapel in her native town of W., and had won the veil. The principal replied, "That number is not on the list, but I will put it down and you shall take it," Miss M. having had no previous intention of putting into the raffle. She, however, took the number and won the prize, which being of little use to her, she again offered for sale, but failed to obtain a purchaser. Time passed on, and she returned to her home. A good while afterwards Miss L. called on the young milliner and asked whether she had not a veil she wished to dispose of, and being answered in the affirmative, the veil was purchased at the original price, £5, and was worn by Miss L. at her wedding, the bridegroom being the minister of the very chapel in which the winning number had appeared so plainly visible to the dreaming eye of the young sensitive. Another singular phenomenon of the same class happened during the current year, the dreamer in this case being a servant in the employ of a member of the family; the lady whose death has so strangely fore-shadowed that of a cousin of my own. One night, the above domestic told her mistress she had dreamt that Mrs. C. was dead, and that the news had been conveyed in a square black-edged envelope by afternoon post. The mistress begged her not to mention the subject, and endeavoured to set aside the melancholy fancy, but, strange to say, within a day or two, a letter of the exact description arrived by afternoon post with the sad news that the poor girl, who had only been married about a year, had died quite suddenly, and, before her husband could be summoned from the chapel, a short distance off, where he was that morning either preaching or reading prayers.

The above two cases, from private sources, are doubtless but as a drop in the ocean, in comparison with the vast number of similar phenomena which probably are nightly happening among us, and are lost to psychological science either through ignorance of their true value, or that culpable idleness and indifference to matters connected with the higher nature of man which the intensely material life we are all too prone to lead causes us almost naturally to fall into.

BACK NUMBERS OF "LIGHT." SPECIAL NOTICE.

* The Editor will be obliged if any subscriber, having copies of the following numbers of "LIGHT" to spare, will kindly forward them to the office. They are urgently required for sets. Full price will in each case be given for them.

No. 105 for January 6th, 1883.
" 106 " " 13th, "
" 128 " " June 16th, "
" 127 " " August 18th, "

SPECIAL NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS.—Subscriptions to LIGHT for 1884 are now due. We shall be obliged if subscribers will forward the amount, viz., 10s. 10d., for each copy, without further application, to "The Manager of 'LIGHT,'" 3, St. James-street, Bedford-row, London, W.C. P.O.O.'s may be made payable to Henry Barnes. While remitting for the copies supplied to them personally, our readers may, in view of the interesting series of papers by "M.A. (Oxon.)," to appear during the forthcoming year, feel inclined to order an extra copy to be sent to the address of some friend or acquaintance likely to be interested in this subject. Were this course adopted by each reader it would at once place "LIGHT" on a secure financial basis, and enable us to devote attention to the carrying out of various improvements which cannot even be considered until this position is secured.

EXPERIENCES IN SPIRITUALISM.

No. II.

By H. T. HUMPHREYS.

In the latter part of 1866, Mr. S. C. Hall, who took the initiative in the establishment of the Spiritual Athenæum in Sloane street, invited me with others to join the council, and one evening when he, Mr. Jencken, Mr. Perdicaris, Mr. D. D. Home, and myself had met at the rooms, which had been taken in Sloane-street, and were engaged in the discussion of some of the preliminary arrangements, I noticed from the expression of Mr. Home's face that he was looking at something which we could not see. He then told Mr. Hall that a spirit was present, a daughter of Robert Chambers, and gave her name, saying that she wished him to write to her father with reference to her husband. Mr. S. C. Hall said that he did not believe R. Chambers had a daughter so named, and Mr. Home replied, "You may be sure he has," on which there came three raps about us.

Several weeks later I was present with Mr. Home and some others at Mr. S. C. Hall's, Essex-villas, when this spirit again came, and urged Mr. Hall to write to her father, which he had not done, though he had ascertained that the name was correct. She brought with her another spirit, said to be that of a younger sister, who gave as a message simply the two words "Pa, love." Mr. Hall thereupon wrote to Robert Chambers, who perfectly comprehended the message sent, and further stated that the two words "Pa, love," were the last spoken in the world to himself by his little child.

On another occasion Mr. S. C. Hall and myself were sitting with Mr. D. D. Home, at the Spiritual Athenæum, when a chair was carried, without any of us touching it, up to my side. Mr. Home said that he saw my sister carrying it.

On Friday, December 14th, 1866, I went, pursuant to invitation, to the house of Mr. A. R. Wallace, in St. Mark's-crescent, Regent's Park, to spend the evening, and met Miss Nicholl, better known since as Mrs. Guppy. I was on the pavement trying to find out the number of the house, the pavement being separated from the houses by small gardens, some five yards in length, when suddenly Mr. Wallace opened the door. I said, "Did you know I was here?" "No," he replied, "but we heard a knock." I had heard no knock, but it had been heard inside and had led to the door being opened, saving me some doubtful searching for the house. I went in and we sat down to tea, after which we went into the back-room, where a round table near the window was cleared of everything on it. The cloth was then taken off, leaving the bare polished surface of the table exposed. The room was lighted by a single window over which a white blind was drawn, so that, though the gas was turned down to a faint blue point, it was impossible to sit in anything like total darkness as the light of a bright moonlight night made its way through the white blind, sufficiently to enable us all to see each other's outlines at least.

We were eight in number: Mr. and Mrs. Wallace, Mrs. Sims, Miss Nicholl, Dr. Wilenshurst, Mr. and Mrs. J. Marshman and myself. Mr. Wallace sat with his back to the window; I sat opposite to him, and could see in the polished surface of the table a patch of white light reflected from the window opposite. We had all entered the room through folding doors which were behind my seat. Miss Nicholl sat about a yard from me, to my left hand, with her back to the fireplace. We sat without touching each other or the table, being in what must be described as an imperfect circle round it.

After we had sat quietly and motionless for a few seconds, I noticed that the bright patch on the table was obscured by something dark, and gazing intently at this I saw the darkness spreading, though there was not the faintest sound audible. I put out my hand and took hold, to my surprise, of a sprig of solanum with its berry. I said, "Why! there are flowers on the table." I then withdrew my hand and observed the obscuration of the reflected light increasing until a message came to give light, when the gas was turned up, and we found on the table thirty-seven stalks of flowers, all of which were fresh, cold and damp, with a frosty dew, as if they had that moment been brought out of the night air. This cold dew passed off in a few minutes. Mr. Wallace, on going into his study, which was directly over the room we sat in, found that a few additional sprigs of flowers had been placed on his writing-table.

In December, 1866, a little son of mine, then eleven months old, was attacked with scarlet fever, and left me for the spirit land. My wife could not remain in the apartments which we then occupied, and we took a small house at Finchley. On the 3rd February, 1867, as my wife and I were sitting, my sister's spirit announced "Joseph is here," and then the message was given from him—

"Higher than the heavens are the ways of God. He took me from my dear father and mother that I might prepare their mansion for them in Heaven when they have finished their time on earth—I will fill it with flowers."

His mother said a few words to him, rather charging him with having shewn, while on earth, more affection for me than for her, and the reply was:—

"Mamma, I gave you my hand to kiss just before I went away, and I loved you always and papa too."

The first statement was accurate, for the child had put out his little hand to his mother just at the moment of parting.

As relating to this I here narrate a message in 1875. In March of that year it was found necessary to sacrifice the life of a baby to save that of Mrs. Humphreys, and after she had somewhat recovered, she and I sat on the 18th April, and we had the following message:—

"Ismail sends Joseph to tell you he is happy."

I said, "Who is Ismail?" and received for reply that he was the baby above-mentioned.

I said, "Who gave him the name of Ismail?"

The reply was, "God, innocent Son of the Creator; He stands by the throne of God."

I said, "Joseph, you said you would fill our house with flowers. Will Ismail help you?"

The reply was, "Yes. We will fill your house with flowers and light from the throne of God. It will be the most beautiful house in Heaven when you come into it."

Now whencesoever the above messages, said to be from my little Joseph, really came, one thing is perfectly clear to me, namely, that neither Mrs. Humphreys nor myself had any such ideas in our minds before the messages were spelled out.

In the latter part of 1867 I received a brief note from my old friend, Mr. S. C. Hall, informing me that Mr. D. D. Home was at his house and wished to see me. I went out to Essex-villas, where he then resided, in the evening, and met Mr. Home and three or four others. The other visitors left early, and Mr. and Mrs. S. C. Hall were standing in a recess leading from the drawing-room into a conservatory, when Mrs. Hall remarked that it was a long time since they had had a séance. Mr. Home said, "I can't sit now; I am not well, and have been talking about matters that excite me." He then sat down to a piano, but before he could open it a shower of raps were heard, as if from the inside of the instrument. "Do you hear the raps?" he said. "Come, we will have a sitting." Mr. S. C. Hall, Mr. Home, Mrs. S. C. Hall, and myself then sat round a small octagon table, the top of which was covered with cloth. It was what is known as a kettle-drum table, standing upon three turned legs, which were screwed into the top. Presently raps were heard on the table, which was tilted and raised straight up into the air, then rolled into the lap of Mrs. S. C. Hall, and next into my lap. It was then placed on my foot, on which it was balanced and swayed to and fro. Next it was turned upside down, the top being at about the height of our heads, and the legs in the air above. Raps were then heard, and a message was given that this was the then condition of Spiritualism, but that it would soon come—and at the word the table was placed on its legs in our midst. "Right," said Mrs. S. C. Hall, her guess being answered by numerous affirmative raps.

Mr. Home then rose and walked to and fro, and presently began to grow taller, for though we had no lights, there was enough in the room from outside to see the outline of his figure. He then shrank to some six or eight inches below his natural height. He said he felt as if his hair was being pulled, but without causing pain; on the contrary, he described the sensation as pleasant. He came over to me, and at his request, I placed my feet on his up to the instep, in order to be satisfied that he did not stand on his toes. At the same time I placed my right hand on his body horizontally, partly on his waistcoat and partly on his trousers. The upper part of his body then rose to such an extent that my hand in a few moments was on his shirt, while the vest and trousers were an inch or so above and below it respectively. After remaining for a few moments at the height of about seven feet, Mr. Home shrank to his usual stature, and gradually down to only some five feet. This was three or four times repeated, and we were given to understand that it would have a curative effect.

Mr. Home then resumed his seat at the table, and raps were heard in different parts of the room. The table was again lifted, and placed inverted on the head of Mr. Home, he remaining perfectly motionless. The words were then spelled out by raps on the table, "It is hard to bear, but it is a crown." The table was then replaced in our midst, and in a few seconds more was lifted up and thrown on the floor about six feet behind Mr. S. C. Hall. We remained in our seats, and presently, as I held my hands down between my knees, I felt something touch my knuckles. I opened my right hand and took hold of the leg of the octagon table, which it now appeared had been unscrewed and brought to me. Sentences were then spelled out, "Let it represent the weapon of truth," "Truth is strength," "We will give you strength where you most need it." Presently I felt that something was dragging the leg of the table away from me. For a time I resisted, but at length it was dragged from me with a considerable amount of force, and was stuck down Mr. Home's back between his coat and his spine. While in this position some messages were given by its tipping against my hand, which I held up to it. It was then worked about Mr. Home's back, and finally slid down it beneath his coat. I had my hand on the end of it as it was sliding down, but though I left my seat at once and went round to find out whither it was going, I failed to feel it underneath Mr. Home's coat. I then returned to my seat opposite to him, to find that the leg of the table was on it, resting on the seat and the middle bar of the back of the chair. While it had been in the back of his coat, Mr. Home said he felt as if under the influence of shocks from an electric battery. The octagon table was then placed again upright in our midst, and maintained in this position, though on only two of its three legs. Messages were again given, and at length I asked what was to be done with the leg of the table, which remained where I had found it on my chair, I sitting beside it.

As I spoke the leg of the table rose from its position upright in the air, was bent towards me, and gently touched me on the eye; next bent towards and touched Mrs. Hall, saluted Mr. S. C. Hall in the same manner, and then darted rapidly across the table and down to the floor. We then heard the sound of screwing it into its place, and I put my hand under the table and touched it. This stopped the work, which was, on my taking away my hand, resumed and completed, after which the table was jumped upon the floor on this leg, as if to show that it had been firmly replaced; raps were heard all over the room, and sounds like the laugh of a child resounded in the air.

A large and heavy sofa, which stood against the wall some seven feet from us, was drawn up quietly till it touched the chair on which Mr. S. C. Hall sat, and at the same time two large photograph albums were removed from a shelf behind the sofa. We remained seated during the whole time.

Soon after this, a luminous coronet of star-like points appeared on the head of Mr. S. C. Hall and remained for some time. A somewhat luminous cloud-like appearance was seen close to him, and he said he felt as if it were pressing against him. It assumed the outline of a face with two star-like eyes.

Mr. Home then rose from his chair, and appeared to be walked to and fro, complaining of pressure on his head. I then noticed that he appeared to be wearing a crown shaped like a Greek patera, the base of which fitted like a skull cap. As he passed where the admission of more light allowed me to see this more clearly, I observed tendrils and leaves as of a vine hanging over the edges of the patera. Mr. Home appeared much agitated, and repeated, "I am crowned," "I am free from pain," "I am receiving a new mission," "The pain in my head is gone." He continued to walk up and down the room in great excitement, till the crown was removed from his head, while sweet-toned notes appeared to proceed from it. It approached us where we sat and moved off gently up to the corner of the room, just above the door, where the light from it was visible for some minutes.

Mr. Home, who had been previously very ill, was restored to perfect health on that evening. This was the second occasion on which Mr. Home was elongated.

"WHO ARE OUR SPIRITUAL ENEMIES?"

A PATCHWORK FROM BÖHME.

VII.

In this inquiry into the nature of our unseen foes, I am considering them as abettors of evil in man, rather than his antagonists; for into the mystery of their enmity to man, as such, I have here as little cause to enter as I have capacity for its comprehension. This much, however, is no sort of mystery, that the evil always detest the good, and try to bring down comparative innocence to their own state. There can be no doubt that this instinct for promoting wickedness is strong beyond our bounded scope of vision. And, among all the tender mercies of the Father of Spirits, I suppose none to be much greater than the concealment of cruel enemies, whose power to intimidate, even if not allowed to harass us otherwise, would be fully equal to their malice. While we are in the flesh we have a veil which hides them from us, and, if Böhmé did not mistake, many of us from them, unless fellow feeling gives them insight to us through our passions. Speaking of "a soul new-born in the light of God," he says: "The devil cannot see that soul, for the second principle wherein it liveth, on which God and Paradise, is shut up from him, and he cannot get to it." ("Three Principles," chap. 5, par. 5.) And again, when speaking of covetousness, "It is the eye of hell; the devil seeth man therewith into soul and body." ("Six Points," chap. 10, par. 48.) But, quite apart from hostility to man, the "wrath of nature wills to be manifested." ("Election," chap. 8, par. 130.) And hence the terrific discord of the divided forms of nature tends to continual increase, for "know and observe that every life standeth upon the abyss of the fierceness." . . . "We all, in the originality of our life, have the source of the anger and of the fierceness, or else we should not be alive, but we must look to it and in ourselves go forth out of the source of the fierceness with God, and generate the love in us, and then our life shall be a joyful and pleasant habitation to us, and then it standeth rightly in the Paradise of God." "For God calleth Himself a consuming fire and also a God of love, and His name, God, hath its original in the love where He goeth forth out of the source in Himself, and maketh it in Himself joy, Paradise, and the Kingdom of Heaven." . . . "But if our life stay in the fierceness, or in covetousness envy, anger, and malice, and goeth not forth into another will, then it standeth in the anguishing source as all devils do." ("Appendix to Three Principles," pars. 28, 29.) In that anguishing source are countless tormentors; but they cannot approach us until we open what one may compare to a sluice or dam of a river, rather than to a door, so great is the inrush as soon as it is made possible. "The devil continueth in his own dominion or principality, not indeed in that wherein God created him, but in the aching, painful birth of eternity, in the centre of nature and property of wrath; in the property which begetteth darkness, anguish and pain." ("On True Resignation," chap. 3, par. 8.)

Now the soul of man necessarily shares that property with him; it is the root of all creaturely life. "The devil hath no authority or power over it, only that which is the source of anxiety in the soul is the very source or quality of his life." ("On the Complexions," chap. 4, par. 100.) And with this ocean of potential torment close about it, the soul is so lightly, quickly moved from one property to another, that a thought can do it. "The life of man in this time is like a wheel, where very suddenly that which is undermost becometh uppermost and kindleth itself in every creature." ("Point" 2, par. 22.) We all know something of the daily marvels that result from this, and must have observed how entirely just, right, and inevitable anger and scorn, for instance, appear to us while they are felt; how they seem to take intensifying colour from all that is occurring at the time, and how actually false to the truth of things a companion appears who condemns such feelings as misleading. "I do well to be angry; I cannot but feel scorn!" is what we feel. Now as with the rise of anger a whole spiritual world flies open to us, and in that world every wrathful thought is strictly in its own element, this temporary hallucination is quite intelligible. "Alas," said Carlyle, writing to his mother, "why should I dwell in the element of contempt and indignation rather than in that of patience and love?" (For the mind that is prone on all occasions to kindle into wrath on the slightest provocation, often abhors the folly.) Why? Carlyle did not guess that in every element of contempt and indignation there are mighty confederates; that our own access to that element introduces us to their wrath, and this corroborates ours. As Böhmé has it, "The darkness grasps the holy power" (i.e., deific powers in human nature) "and brings it into malignity, and then it is as the Scripture says, with the perverse thou art perverse, and with the holy thou art holy." ("Election," chap. 8, par. 83, "Thou"—God in Man.) In precisely the same manner, and with the same plausibility, does every vice—covetousness, gluttony, lust, revenge—justify itself: and every indulgence of either propensity strengthens its hold on the will and its certain velocity of increase. For "the image of the spirit of the soul" (that which desire and imagination tend to form) "sticketh in the mind, and to whatsoever the mind inclineth and giveth up itself, in that is the spirit of the soul figured by the Eternal Fiat." ("Three Principles," chap. 16, par. 43.) And if malignant or sensual properties have thus become creaturely in the human soul, the difficulty of opposing them by any properties that have not is, of course, tremendously increased; and when at last these evil properties rule, "l'horreur de la situation, c'est que c'est dans sa propre volonté que réside cette puissance là, et que sa volonté est soumise elle-même à cette puissance qu'elle s'est créée et engendrée."*

Therefore was our Saviour so stringent in requiring self-denial as indispensable to true life; "therefore, Christ so emphatically and punctually teacheth us in the new birth love, humility and meekness." . . . "For the desire of revenge ariseth in the centre of the dark fiery wheel of the Eternal Nature." . . . "And the soul's fiery form stands in the Rachá as a mad, furious wheel which confounds the essence in the body and destroys or shatters in pieces the understanding." ("Mysterium Magnum," chap. 22, par. 62.)

Now when our Lord said, "Whosoever shall say to his brother, thou fool, shall be in danger of hell fire," human reason naturally understood a fire that was both external to the soul in present time, and occupying space in a future world, and in earlier ages probably no ideas less childish could have taken hold on the gross intellect of unenlightened Christendom. But it is on the strength of such absurd and obsolete ideas that even now much ignorant talk about the disproportionate judgments of an "angry God" still gains a hearing. It is surely time for such false coin to be called in. Long ago Böhmé taught what that hell-fire is,—latent in every soul,—making it obvious that if that consuming and indestructible fire does not generate light and the meekness of light, it must torment with a famished desire for the bliss it cannot find. Let him explain himself as well as passages taken from their context can explain. "No creaturely spirit can subsist in the creature without the fire-world, for even the love of God could not be if His anger world were not in Him. The anger or the fire of God is a cause of the light, and of the power, strength, and omnipotency." ("Apology" 3, Text 1, par. 57.)

SPIRITUALISM IN GERMANY.

There are now five periodicals devoted to this subject in Germany and Austria. It is attracting a constantly increasing attention; circles for investigation are numerous, and there appears to be no want of "mediums" of every description. Fortunately, professional mediumship, as far as I can make out, is unknown. Above all, the number of scientific and philosophical minds engaged upon the subject, and dealing with it from a strictly psychological point of view, is a conspicuous and hopeful fact. This tendency, ably represented in the Press by Psychische Studien, is not, however, prevailing without some symptoms of a division in the ranks. There, as here, the Spiritists—to use a distinctive term—seem to fear that all the significance, all the heart of the phenomena, is in danger of being eaten out by psychological speculation. No explanation is welcomed or encouraged by this section which does not recognise an individual agent, "jenseits."* The philosophers, on the other hand, are rallying in every direction to the thought that our own "jenseit" is a field of vast and heretofore unsuspected extent, and that the transcendental imagination is a productive power. The distinction between the physiological Ego and the profound reserve of life and powers which can only filter, as it were, into our organic consciousness, as this is "normally" conditioned, is obtaining more and more frequent and definite expression. The facts of somnambulism induced and spontaneous, in all its phases, have proved very suggestive in this respect. And acceptance of the Kantian philosophy of time and space has immensely assisted the German mind in the comprehension of phenomena over which we are still fumbling and blundering. It is Germany, I believe, that we shall have to thank—and that perhaps soon—for the successful application of idealist philosophy to empirical science, through the revelations of psychology. That the latter will prove human immortality as surely as would the agency of disembodied spirits,—for which also there is ample scope—need not be doubted. Or rather there can be no question at all of our "survival," when the fact is established that it is only a little bit of us that has ever been embodied! But of course, as it is just that little bit† which we have been used to call our Ego, our conceptions of individuality will have to be considerably enlarged, and identification may not be altogether easy.

Licht, mehr Licht and Spiritualistische Blätter are the only German papers besides Psychische Studien that I have seen. They appear to represent the older, and more orthodox Spiritism, rather than the scientific tendencies of M. Aksakow's magazine. But they are in their way just as speculative. Readers of "LIGHT" are supposed to murmur at the length to which speculative articles occasionally run in that paper. But even I have never offended to the extent of the interminable essays which occupy a wholly disproportionate space in these German weeklies. Spiritualism has lately been in the law courts in Brunswick, an action for libel having been brought against a guest at a séance, who published a description of it imputing gross credulity to the sitters by name. The judgment decided that the article did not exceed the limits of legitimate criticism.

TO CONTRIBUTORS.

Reports of the proceedings of Spiritualist Societies in as succinct a form as possible, and authenticated by the signature of a responsible officer, are solicited for insertion in "LIGHT." Members of private circles will also oblige by contributing brief records of noteworthy occurrences at their séances.

The Editor cannot undertake the return of manuscripts unless the writers expressly request it at the time of forwarding and enclose stamps for the return postage.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.

The Annual Subscription for "LIGHT," post free to any address within the United Kingdom, or to places comprised within the Postal Union, including all parts of Europe, the United States, and British North America, is 10s. 10d. per annum, forwarded to our office in advance.

ADVERTISEMENT CHARGES.

Five lines and under, 3s. One inch, 4s. 6d. Half-column, £1. Whole Column, £2 2s. Pages, £4. A reduction made for a series of insertions.

Orders for Papers and Advertisements may be addressed to "The Manager." All other communications should be sent to "The Editor."

Cheques and Post Office Orders may be made payable to HENRY BARNES, at the Chief Office, London. Halfpenny Postage Stamps received for amounts under 10s.

Orders for Advertisements may also be sent to "The Press Publishing Company," 4, Wine Office Court, Fleet Street, E.C., on or before Wednesday in each week.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

"LIGHT" may be obtained direct from our Office, and also from H. W. ALLEN, 4, Ave Maria-lane, London, and all Booksellers.

NOTICE OF REMOVAL.

Special attention is directed to the change in the address of the offices of this paper. They are now situated at 3, GREAT JAMES STREET, BEDFORD ROW, LONDON, W.C., and for the future all communications should be so addressed.

1883.—A RETROSPECT.

By "M. A. (OXON.)"

The year that is now closing has been one of change; in many respects of progress. It has witnessed a steady spread of Spiritualism in private circles, and some decline of interest in those phases of the subject which have had their day. There will probably never come a time when the public circle will not be necessary for those who can get their experience in no other way: but public Spiritualism, conducted in the old manner, produced such a crop of imposture, of doubt and difficulty, of perplexity and bewilderment, that it was very generally felt that there was something in its methods that needed amendment. To this widespread feeling was due the action of the Central Association which resulted in the general discouragement by English Spiritualists of the promiscuous dark séance.

The work of the Central Association may be said to have terminated with that practical action. In Spiritualism it is essentially true that "the old order changeth giving place to new," and the Society, which for ten years, and in more forms than one, had laboured with marked success in the cause of Spiritualism, has passed, in the closing days of this year of change, into a new order of existence. Its work was accomplished, and it has handed on to a successor that which yet remains. It would be at once ungracious and unjust to refuse to the Association the meed of praise due for a long course of energetic and successful labour. When memory does its work, it will recall much that was of eminent service to the cause with which the B.N.A.S. and C.A.S. must be credited.

The Society for Psychical Research has continued its course of cautious and painstaking work, and is rendering a service to Spiritualism which Spiritualists will appreciate in the future more than they are able to do now that the processes are so largely hidden. It is, however, abundantly sure that the experimental, and especially the literary, work of the Society will be of the highest value, not merely from the point of view of the man of science, but also of the Spiritualist.

This is not the place to speak of the Theosophical Society, which has occupied a considerable share of public attention, and has displayed a good deal of activity. The public gathering of Theosophists and their friends, and the addresses of Dr. Anna Kingsford and Mr. Sinnett, marked a new departure in the tactics of the Society. Since then we have not heard so much of their proceedings.

Other societies in London do not fall within the scope of this notice: but all work done, so it be honest work, is a subject for gratitude.

What especially concerns my readers is the career of this journal during the past twelve months. It has been one of steady growth and increasing prosperity. A glance through the pages of "LIGHT" shows what a wide area of subjects has been traversed. It is impossible to do more than indicate some among many.

Of miscellaneous articles, Professor Barrett has contributed several "Pièces Justificatives of the Need of a Society for Psychical Research." Mr. Henry Spicer, a well-known writer on Spiritualism, has sent an excellent series of narratives embodying facts of much value. Mr. Hensleigh Wedgwood has given a large number of facts, especially of premonitory dreams and cases of thought-transference and transcorporeal action. Mrs. A. M. Howitt Watts' indefatigable pen has seldom been idle, and the journal owes to her some of its most attractive papers. Miss F. J. Theobald has sent various papers on home séances and the judicious development of mediumship in private. There has been continued also from time to time a series of my "Spirit Teachings."

When we come to philosophical subjects, "C. C. M." has laid us under a heavy debt of obligation by his original papers, as well as by the number of translations from the German—many of them of the highest value and interest—which he has contributed. Mr. Roden Noel, Mrs. Penny, and Mr. Sinnett have also given us elaborate dissertations on various philosophical and metaphysical subjects.

It must needs be that a number of papers can only be alluded to. Such, not inferior in merit to others that have been named, are Dr. Chazarnin's on Materialisation (ably translated by Dr. Dixon), Mr. S. C. Hall's records of remarkable séances, Mr. Page Hopps' "Scientific and Spiritual Basis of Belief in a Future Life"; Mrs. A. M. H. Watts' on "Transcorporeal Action of Spirit," and the "White Lady"; Mr. J. W. Slater's, editor of the Journal of Science, on "Spiritualism from a Scientific Point of View"; Dr. Purdon on "Personality of the Universal Mind"; Mr. Cranstoun's "Psychical Phenomena in Ancient Greece"; and others which space forbids even to enumerate.

The new list of books noticed during the year is longer than can be detailed. It includes Mr. Stock's "Attempts at Truth"; Mr. S. C. Hall's "Reminiscences"; Lady Bloomfield's "Reminiscences"; Brittain's "Battle-ground of the Spiritual Reformation"; Mr. F. W. H. Myers' "Collected Essays"; "Letters from a Mystic in the Present Day"; General Forlong's "Rivers of Life"; Charles Bray's "Science of Man"; "A Little Pilgrim in the Unseen"; "Beyond the Gates"; "Sinners and Saints" (Mormon and Shaker Spiritualism); "M.A. (Oxon.)'s" "Spirit Teachings"; Mrs. Howitt Watts' "Pioneers of the Spiritual Reformation"; Mr. Sinnett's "Esoteric Buddhism"; Mr. Arthur Lillie's "Popular Life of Buddha." This list, by no means exhaustive of modern literature, does not include the number of old and standard works which have been reviewed—such, for instance, as Hibbert's "Philosophy of Apparitions"—nor does it make any reference to copious notices of current articles in journals and magazines bearing upon Spiritualism.

The subject of healing of ascertained disease has occupied a large amount of space. Psychopathy in general; Mesmeric healing; healing in trance and by spirit-agency; healing by the aid of men still embodied, as is alleged in the case of Colonel Olcott's remarkable cures in India and Ceylon; healing by the exercise of will; healing by faith, as in the case of Lourdes water; healing by prayer and by the laying on of hands, have occupied attention, and it is not too much to say that the body of evidence adduced is overwhelming.

The "Notes by the Way," which have formed a regular feature of the paper week by week, have covered topics of current interest, and have dealt with a vast number of subjects. Psychopathy in many aspects; Dreams, Visions, Premonitions, Signs and Warnings; Mediumship, its nature, its best methods of development, its responsibilities; Psychography in notable cases: these and many other subjects have come up at various times for notice. The passing notices of subjects connected with Spiritualism, which have appeared in books, magazines, and journals, have been recorded and criticised. Old and forgotten facts bearing on modern experience have been placed in their proper relation and bearing on what has been occurring among us.

But space forbids further detail. What has been enumerated will give some idea of the large field that is being cultivated with increasing success and acceptance. The wide circulation of "LIGHT" would, I am convinced, be a work for Spiritualism of which the value would soon be seen, and it lies within the power of most of us. I may have more to say on this when I come to estimate the prospects of 1884. Meantime I trust that it may be for all of us a year of peace, harmony, and progress.

"RESEARCHES IN SPIRITUALISM," BY
"M.A. (OXON.)."

It is with great pleasure we have to announce that our valued and esteemed contributor "M.A. (Oxon.*)" has placed in our hands, for publication in "LIGHT," the continuation of his "Researches in Spiritualism," the first portions of which appeared in Human Nature, a magazine now defunct, in the years 1874 and 1875. The forthcoming chapters deal with the evidence for materialisation, or, as it is perhaps more correctly called, "Form Manifestation," and will, we have no doubt, prove of absorbing interest to our readers. The articles will appear, as far as practicable, week by week, and, in view of the probably increased demand for the numbers of "LIGHT" containing these papers, we shall be pleased to receive an early notification from any of our readers who require extra sets, as it is not our practice to print many copies in excess of the current demand.

OUR NEW OFFICES.

ARRANGEMENTS FOR VISITORS, INQUIRERS, &c.

It may not be amiss to draw special attention to the fact that our new offices at 3, Great James-street, Bedford-row, London, W.C., are centrally situated, and are easily accessible from all the principal railway stations of the Metropolis, besides being close to Holborn, one of the main omnibus routes. Country friends and readers who may be passing through, or making a brief stay in London, can have their letters addressed to our care, and we shall be pleased in every way in our power to render them any assistance they may require. Most of the principal spiritual periodicals are filed for the use of visitors, who will also be provided with facilities for writing letters, meeting their friends, &c., &c. These arrangements are made as a kind of stop-gap for the period which will elapse between the closing of the rooms of the late C.A.S. and the opening of the new premises of the London Spiritualist Alliance, and also to supply a place of meeting and centre of information of some kind for those interested in psychological studies. We hope our friends will not hesitate to avail themselves of any little attention we may be able to shew them in this way.

We have also had placed in our hands, for free distribution, several small parcels of books and pamphlets suitable for investigators, and our readers will be rendering a service both to the cause and ourselves, if they will bear this in mind. Upon receipt of the name and address of any person to whom such a packet is likely to be useful, we will send, post free, a few selected back numbers of "LIGHT," together with one or two pamphlets bearing upon the elementary study of Spiritualism, or upon application we will send a small parcel for personal distribution. This would be an easy but effective method of extending the usefulness of this journal; and if each reader of "LIGHT" will personally supplement our efforts in this direction, and utilise the facilities we are able to place at their disposal, the new year upon which we are about to enter will, undoubtedly, prove a most successful one. We leave this matter with much confidence in the hands of our many friends.

MOVEMENT IN FRANCE AND BELGIUM.

By the Revue Spirite we learn that the anniversary meeting in commemoration of Allan Kardec and his departed disciples was recently held in Paris. Fervent orations and poems were delivered to a numerous and sympathetic audience.

The Revue also informs us that at the meeting of the Belgian Spiritualist Federation in September last, a proposition was brought forward for calling together an universal congress with the special object of considering the formation of an Universal Organisation of Spiritualists and Spiritists. The proposition was most warmly received. The president, M. J. Guerin, said that if such a proposition were acted upon considerable expense would have to be met, and that he, for his own part, would be ready to start the Belgian subscription list to meet such expenses with 5,000fr. He thought such a congress in the present position of Spiritualists and Spiritists was urgently called for, and that it would be possible to hold it in a year or two if the matter were discussed, as he hoped it would be, in Spiritualist and Spiritist journals.

CHRISTMAS ANGELS.

There are angels' voices near us,
Though we cannot hear a word;
And the air with soft vibrations
Of their unseen wings is stirred.
They are evermore about us,
God's bright messengers of love,
Waking holy aspirations
For their sinless land above.

But most often we are conscious
Of their presence on the earth,
At the time when we are keeping
Our Redeemer's mystic birth;
When we think of all our dear ones,
Who are scattered far and wide,
With most fervent prayers, and blessings,
All the joyful Christmastide.

And I think the unseen angels
On their shining wings appear
Our most holy thoughts up yonder
To the home of love and prayer.
When at last we see their faces,
We shall better understand
The exceeding peace and beauty
Of the love-lit Christmas land.

"THE BROTHERS" OF THEOSOPHY.

No. II.

In continuation of the paper on this subject, recently read by Mr. Sinnett, the following address by the same author has been communicated to us for publication:—

Many people who approach the consideration of occult philosophy, are inclined to lay great emphasis on the difference between believing in the existence of those whom we call "the Brothers," and believing in the vast and complicated body of teaching which has now been accumulated by their recent pupils. I think it can really be shown that there is no halting place at which a man who sets out on this inquiry can rationally pause and say, "Thus far will I go, and no farther." The chain of considerations which will lead any one who has once realised the existence of the Adepts to feel sure that there can be no great errors in a conception of nature obtained with their help, consists of many links, but is really unbroken in its continuity, and equally capable of bearing a strain at any point.

It consists of many links, partly because no one at present among those who are in our position as students—who are living, that is to say, an ordinary worldly life all the while that they are intellectually studying Occultism—can ever obtain in his own person a complete knowledge of the Adepts. He cannot, that is to say, come to know of his own personal knowledge all about even any one Adept. The full elucidation of this difficulty leads to a proper comprehension of the principle on which the Adepts shroud themselves in a partial seclusion, a seclusion which has only become partial within a very recent period, and was so complete until then that the world at large was hardly aware of the existence of any esoteric knowledge from which it could be shut out. This is a matter that is all the more important because experience has shown how the world at large has been quick to take offence at the hesitating and imperfect manner in which the Adepts have hitherto dealt with those who have sought spiritual instruction at their hands. Judging the occult policy pursued by comparison with inquiries on the plane of physical knowledge, the impatience of inquirers is very natural, but none the less does even a limited acquaintance with the conditions of mystic research shew the occult policy to be reasonable likewise.

Of course everyone will admit that Adepts are justified in exercising great caution in regard to communicating any peculiar scientific knowledge which would put what are commonly called magical powers within the reach of persons not morally qualified for their exercise. But the considerations that prescribe this caution do not seem to operate also in reference to the communication of knowledge concerning the spiritual progress of man or the grander processes of evolution. And in truth the Adepts have come to that very conclusion; they have undertaken the communication to the general public of their safe theoretical knowledge, and the effort they are making merely hangs fire or may seem to do so to some observers, by reason of the magnitude of the task in hand, and the novel aspect it wears, as well for the teachers as for the students. For remember if there has been that change of policy on the part of the Adepts to which I have just referred, it has been a change of such recent origin that it may almost be described as only just coming on. And if the question be then asked why has this safe theoretical knowledge not been communicated sooner, it seems reasonable to find a reply to that question in the actual state of the intellectual world around us at this moment. The freedom of thought of which English writers often boast, is not very widely diffused over the world as yet, and hardly, at all events, in any generation before this, could the free promulgation of quite revolutionary tenets in religious matters have been safely undertaken in any country. Communities in which such an undertaking would still be fraught with peril, are even now more numerous than those in which it could be set on foot with any practical advantage. One can thus readily understand how in the occult world the question has been one of debate up to our own time, whether it was desirable as yet to promote the dissemination of Esoteric philosophy in the world at large at the risk of provoking the acrimonious controversies, and even more serious disturbances, liable to arise from the premature disclosure of truths which only a small minority would really be ready to accept. Keeping this in view, the mystery of the Adepts' reserve, up till recently, can hardly be thought so astounding as to drive us on violent alternative hypotheses at variance with all the plain evidence concerning their present action. There is manifest reason why they should be careful in launching a body of newly won disciples on to the general stream of human progress; and added to this, the force of their own training is such as to make them habitually cautious to a far greater extent than the utmost prudence of ordinary life would render ordinary men. "But," it will be argued, "granting all this, but assuming that at last some of the Adepts, at all events, have come to the conclusion that some of their knowledge is ripe for presentation to the world, why do they not present as much as they do present, under guarantees of a more striking, irresistible, and conclusive kind than those which have actually been furnished?" I think the answer may be easily drawn from the consideration of the way in which it would be natural to expect that a change of policy amongst the Adepts, in a matter of this kind, would gradually be introduced. By the hypothesis we conceive them but just coming to the conclusion that it is desirable to teach mankind at large some portions of that spiritual science hitherto conveyed exclusively to those who give tremendous pledges in justification of their claim to acquire it. They will naturally advance, in dealing with the world at large, along the same lines they have learned to trust in dealing with aspirants for regular initiation. Never in the history of the world have they sought out such aspirants, courted them or advertised for them in any way whatever. It has been found an inviolable law of human progress that some small percentage of mankind will always come into the world invested by nature with some of the attributes proper to adeptship, and with minds so constituted as to catch conviction as to the possibilities of the occult life, from the least little sparks of evidence on the subject that may be floating about. Of persons so constituted some have always been found to press forward into the ranks of chelaship, to resort, that is to say, to any devices or opportunities that circumstances may afford them for fathoming occult knowledge. When thus besieged by the aspirant the Adept has always, sooner or later, disclosed himself. The change of policy now introduced prescribes that the Adept shall make one step towards the disclosure of himself in advance of the aspirant's demand upon him, but we can easily understand how the Adept, in first making this change, would argue that if many chelas have hitherto come forward in the absence of any spontaneous action from his side, it might be that an almost dangerous rush of ill-qualified aspirants would be invited by any manifestation from him that should be more than a very slight one. At any rate, the Adept would say it would be premature to begin by too sensational a display of faculties inherent in advanced spiritual knowledge with which the world at large is as yet unfamiliar. It will be better at first to make such an offer as will only be calculated to inflame the imagination of persons only one step removed beyond those whose natural instincts would lead them into the occult life. This appears actually to have been the reasoning on which the Adepts have proceeded so far, and this may help us to understand how it is that, as I began by saying, no one person amongst those outer students, who have been called lay-chelas, has yet been enabled to say that of his own personal knowledge he knows all about any of the Adepts.

On the other hand, putting together the various scattered revelations concerning the Brothers which have been distributed amongst various people in India belonging to the Theosophical Society, so much can be learned about the Adepts as to put us in a very strong position in regard to estimating their qualifications for speaking with confidence as they do about the actual facts of nature on the super-physical plane. These scattered revelations,—if my reasoning in what has gone before may be accepted,—have been broken up and thrown about in fragments designedly, in order that as yet it should only be possible to arrive at a full conviction concerning Adeptship after a certain amount of trouble spent in piecing together the disjointed proofs. But when this process is accomplished we are provided with a certain block of knowledge concerning the Adepts, out of which large inferences must necessarily grow. We find, to begin with, that they do unequivocally possess the power of cognising events and facts on the physical plane of knowledge with which we are familiar, by other means than those connected with the five senses. We find also that they unequivocally possess the power of emerging from their proper bodies and appearing at distant places in more or less ethereal counter-parts thereof which are not only agencies for producing impressions on others, but habitations for the time being of the Adepts' own thinking principles, and thus in themselves, if the proof went no further, demonstrations of the fact that a human soul is something quite independent of brain matter and nerve centres. I do not stop now to enumerate instances. The record of evidence must be dissociated from its manipulation in arguments like the present, but the records are abundant and accessible for all who will take the trouble of examining them. Now, if we know that the Adept's soul can pass at his own discretion into that state in which its perceptive faculties are independent of corporeal machinery, it is not surprising that he should be enabled to make, of his own knowledge, a great many statements concerning processes of nature, reaching far beyond any knowledge that can be obtained by mere physical observation. Take, for example, the Adepts' statement that certain other planets, besides this earth, are concerned with the growth of the great crop of humanity of which we form a part. This is not advanced as a conjecture or inference. The Adepts tell us that once out of the body they find they can cognise events on some other planets as well as in distant parts of our own. This is not the exceptional belief of an exceptionally organised individual, who may be regarded by doubters as hallucinated; there is no room for doubting the fact that it is the concurrent testimony of a considerable body of men engaged in the constant experimental exercise of similar faculties. In this way the fact becomes as much a fact of true science, as the fact that the great nebula in Orion, for instance, exhibits a gaseous spectrum, and is therefore a true nebula. All of us who have star spectroscopes can ascertain that fact for ourselves, if we make use of a clear night when the conditions of observation are possible. To doubt it, would not be to shew greater caution than is exercised by those who believe it, but merely an imperfect appreciation of the evidence. It is true that in regard to the condition of the other planets our acceptance of the Adepts' statement must be governed by our impressions concerning the bona fides of their intention in telling us that they have made such and such observations. So far it is a matter of inference with us whether the Adepts are saying what they believe to be true—when they speak of the septenary chain of planets to which the earth belongs,—or consciously deluding us with a rignmarole of statements which they know to be false. I think it can be shewn in a variety of ways that the latter supposition is absurd. But an exhaustive examination of its absurdity would be a considerable task in itself. For the moment the position I am endeavouring to establish is one which does not depend upon the question whether the Adepts are telling us, in reference to the planets, what they know to be true, or something which they know to be untrue. My present position is that at all events the Adepts themselves know what is true in the matter, and that position, it will be observed, is not vitiated by the fact that, as yet, we, their most recent pupils, are unable to follow in their footsteps and repeat the experiments on which their teaching rests.

The same train of reasoning may be applied to the whole body of teaching which the Theosophical Society is now concerned in endeavouring to assimilate. As offered now to the uninitiated world, it can only take the form of a set of statements on authority. And that sort of statement is not one which is most agreeable to our methods or to the Adepts' habitual methods of teaching. For there is no chemical laboratory in England where the system of teaching is more rigidly confined to the direction of the learner's own experiments, than that same system is adopted with occult chelas following the regular course of initiation. Step by step, as the regular chela is told that such and such is the fact in regard to the inner mysteries of nature, he is shown how to apply his own developing faculties to the direct observation of such facts. But those developing faculties carry with them, as pointed out a-while ago, fresh powers over nature which can only be entrusted to those from whom the Adepts take the recognised pledges. In teaching outsiders as they are trying to do now, the Adepts must depart from their own habitual methods,—we must depart, if we wish to understand what they are willing to teach, from our habitual methods of inquiry. We must suspend our usual demand for proof of each statement made, in turn as it is advanced. We must rest our provisional trust in each statement on our broad general conviction which can be satisfied along familiar lines of demonstration,—that such men as the Adepts certainly exist, even though we cannot visit them at pleasure, that they must understand an enormous block of Nature's laws outside the range of those which the physical senses cognise, that in any statement they make to us, they must be in a position to know absolutely whether that statement is or is not true.

This much fully realised, the truth is that each inquirer in turn becomes satisfied, pau passu with his realisation of the case so far, that reason revolts against the notion that the Adepts can be engaged in their present attempt to convey some of their own knowledge to the world at large in any other than the purest good faith. It may be concluded that we who have come to the conclusion that their teaching is altogether to be accepted, are rearing a large inverted pyramid upon a small base. But the logical strength of our position is not impaired by this objection. In every branch of human knowledge, inferences far transcend the observed facts out of which they grow. And even in the most exact science of all, a theorem is held to be proved if any alternative hypothesis is found, on examination, to be irrational. Moreover, the doctrine even of legal testimony recognises the value of secondary evidence where in the nature of the case it is impossible that primary evidence can be forthcoming. That is exactly the state of the case in regard to the present attempt to bridge the gulf that separates the school of physical research from the school of spiritual knowledge. As long as we of this side were justified in doubting whether there was anywhere on earth such a thing as a school of spiritual knowledge, it may have been hardly worth while to worry ourselves with the stray fragments of its teaching which now and then broke loose in barely intelligible shapes. But to doubt the existence of such a school now is equivalent, really, to doubting the statement about the nebula in Orion, according to the illustration I adduced just now. It can only arise from inattention to the facts of the whole case as these now stand,—from reluctance to take that trouble to examine these thoroughly, which still, as a sort of hedge, separates the Theosophical Society from the general community in the midst of which it is planted. Regarded in the light of an occult barrier—as an obstacle which corresponds in the case of the lay-chela, to the really serious ordeals which have to be crossed by the regular chela,—the necessity of taking this trouble can hardly be regarded as a hedge that it is difficult to traverse. And on the other side there lies a wealth of information concerning the mysteries of nature which clearly lights up vast regions of the past and future hitherto shrouded in total darkness for critical intelligences, and the prey for others of untrustworthy conjecture. For those who once thoroughly go into the matter, and obtain a complete mastery over all the considerations I have put forward,—who thus obtain full conviction the Brothers certainly exist, that they must be acquainted with the actual facts about nature behind and beyond this life, that they are now ready to convey a considerable block of their knowledge to us, and that it is ridiculous to distrust their bona fides in doing this,—for all such true Theosophists of the Theosophical Society, nothing, at present, connected with spiritual success is comparable in importance with the study of the vast doctrine now in process of delivery into our hands.

The Mediumship of Mrs. Fox Jencken and Messrs. Husk and Eglinton

SIR,—Although the description of séances, held by well-known mediums, may lack novelty, yet to put on record any salient points, in any sitting, is part of the chronicle of our philosophy. This induces me to send you the following brief report:—

A series of most interesting séances have lately been held at Mrs. Makdougall Gregory's, that indefatigable propagator of our philosophy, the mediums being alternately Messrs. Husk and Eglinton. With Mr. Husk the spirit "Irresistible" is most powerful. On one occasion, he being fully materialised, he was told to guess the contents of a box lying under the séance table. He said he would try, and, stooping, took the rather heavy box from under and placed it upon the table; then placing his hand upon it guessed rightly the nature of its contents. During the evening he spoke French, German, and Dutch. Mr. Husk was also controlled to sing, which he did, exhibiting most extraordinary vocal powers, the song being remarkably interesting both as to words and tune. It was, indeed, a rare musical treat. With regard to Mr. Eglinton's mediumship, he does not seem to have lost any of its power, notwithstanding his long holiday. At every séance four or five spirits materialise, but amongst them one known as the Persian comes forth from the cabinet in a gigantic frame, beautifully proportioned, clad in dazzling white robes and exhibiting most graceful attitudes and motions. Two female spirits are the constant attendants at Mr. Eglinton's seances, which like those held with Mr. Husk prove always most satisfactory in harmonious circles. It has also been my great privilege to assist at a seance held at Mr. S. C. Hall's, on Tuesday, the 11th inst., the medium being the celebrated Mrs. Fox Jencken. During the evening a spirit, whom I had known in the flesh in Italy, but who, impenetrable to spiritual truths, passed away eight years ago, an incorrigible sceptic, manifested by tapping me hard on the shoulder. On being requested to give his name, "Oberto" was rapped on my shoulder, a rather uncommon name, which had entirely left my memory. A beautiful spirit light was also brought in the room by the materialised hand of a spirit dear to the host. With that light the spirit touched the sitters, rapping with it answers to questions. At my request I was allowed to handle the thick rich lace which covered the arm and wrist of the invisible made visible and tangible. At the end of this most interesting seance a sheet of paper was handed me, by invisible agency, upon which a communication was found written, addressed to me, and signed "Axby." This direct writing was traced from right to left, and only readable from the back when held up to the light. The remarkable powers exhibited by these mediums, and by the many more throughout the land, should not be allowed to stand still or deteriorate by want of constant practice.

I must add that the great success of the seances I have just described is undoubtedly due, not only to the great harmony amongst the sitters, but also to their limited number, which is never made to exceed eight.—I am, sir, yours very truly,
G. DAMIANI.

"The Spiritual Alliance."
To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—It is with considerable satisfaction that most of us will read the proposal which appears above the signature "M.A. (Oxon.)" for the formation of a new society, which may attract within its liberal embrace all students of transcendental phenomena, whether styled "occult," "psychical," or "spiritual."

Will you allow me, sir, to take the occasion of this new departure to offer a suggestion, which will, I believe, meet with general support.

There must be a large number of people like myself who have witnessed sufficient convincing phenomena to have become satisfied of the truth of the continuation of life hereafter. To such, the repetition of phenomenal manifestations becomes both unnecessary and distasteful.

I would not dissuade the Society, if it so feels inclined, from covering with the protecting mantle of its influence and strength some specially selected "sensitives" whose organisms offer the conditions necessary for the manifestation of physical phenomena.

We, who have experience of these things, are aware, however, that participation in the conditions under which these phenomena are obtainable, is fraught with danger, and many of us have learned to shun these surroundings.

Such experiences must be but a stepping-stone to higher aims. Once we know, as a fact, that death is not the end of life, that it is but a portal, a re-birth, into other conditions of existence, then arises an unquenchable desire for knowledge concerning those conditions; concerning the eternal forces of which our lives and their surroundings are but temporary and external expressions.

It is evident from the high appreciation which has been repeatedly expressed, how great a value is placed on the "Spirit Teachings" of "M.A. (Oxon.)," which deal with these questions. Unfortunately for us, we cannot ask more from that gentleman than he already kindly gives us. To be able to command a source of information of this character must, I am sure, be a desire shared by large numbers, and it is to this that I beg to call the attention of the new Society.

We are well acquainted with the law of affinity, or polarity, which governs spiritual manifestations; by which like attracts like; by which, therefore, the communications through any given "sensitive" are infallibly the expression of the thought-sphere of that medium, emanating from those intelligences who, being of similar tendencies, and of the same grade of life, find themselves in closest contact with that medium. The life of the sensitive becomes thus a criterion by which we may accurately estimate beforehand the quality of the communications which will be given through that organism.

It is thus evident how important it is, in seeking for an instrument who may be a source of information of the character we refer to, that the organism be of a refined quality, with as elevated a tone of life as possible. I would therefore urge that the proposed new Society do seek for and engage a sensitive whose organism and life be of the required quality to fulfil the above conditions, and that it may make this one of its special objects.

They would thus offer to members the inducement of communication with intelligences of a higher order, a privilege which I am sure would attract numbers of adherents.

Yours obediently,
A SUBSCRIBER.

A Seance with Mrs. Fox Jencken.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—A private circle met at Mrs. Kate Fox Jencken's last night, consisting of four ladies besides the medium. I was one of the number. I have attended several of Mrs. Jencken's sittings, but have never felt so great a power. After various manifestations the message was rapped out that we should "see the independent writing." Shortly after the semblance of a hand appeared in the centre of the table, took up the pencil, and wrote the message which I enclose. It was a dark circle, but the hand illumined the table so that every one could see the paper, and follow the pencil as it stood upright in the hand, tracing the words.

A second message was written and given to me by the hand, which rapped emphatically three times as I took it.

The message ran as follows:—"A great day is dawning. Great events are happening. This truth will triumph over all other theories. All theories will die, but Spiritualism will triumph.—Robert Dale Owen."

Hoping this may be of interest,—I remain, yours sincerely,

ROSAMOND DALE OWEN.

The Transition of Professor Denton.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—It is unfortunately too true that Professor Denton fell a victim to fever in New Guinea. He passed to the higher life on the 26th August last, after eight days' illness, at a village ninety miles inland from Port Moresby. His two sons, with the Argus party, returned to Cooktown, Queensland, on their way back to Melbourne, on October 12th, by the missionary schooner, "Ellangowan." His sons were at Port Moresby at the time of their father's death, and did not hear the sad news until the return of the party there on September 2nd.—Faithfully yours,
J. BOWLING SLOMAN.

A Puzzling Experience.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me to say a few words in reference to the letter of "E. D." in your issue of the 8th inst.?

The doubts and so forth, of which your correspondent speaks, are such as are common to most inquirers into spiritualistic phenomena, and I can confidently predict that "E. D." will have full proof of the truth of Spiritualism if he will but persevere. There is but little doubt that he is the subject of great conflict in the spiritual world—good and evil spirits are evidently striving with each other to give expression to their ideas through his mediumship. He would do well to be very careful as to his way of living whilst this conflict is going on, for every evil resisted will draw more closely to him the good spirits, and, on the other hand, every weakness indulged in will give increased power to the evil influences.

I was much struck by the statement that "E. D." is under the influence of "Meno," as a friend of mine, who suffered from the same kind of doubts as your correspondent, was at one time under the same influence. Acting on advice he received, he strove—successfully—to throw off this influence, and he has since been assured, by his spirit guides, that "Meno" is a most malicious and evil spirit.

Trusting that my remarks may be of some slight assistance to your correspondent, and wishing him every success in the search for truth,—I am, sir, yours faithfully,

GEORGE MCKENZIE.

Miss Corner's Mission Work.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Your readers will be glad to hear that most satisfactory progress is being made in my charitable endeavours for the poor children of East London. I have collected an abundance of warm new clothing for my 200 (I wish it could have been 2,000), besides a large quantity of toys, &c., for the monster Christmas tree. As our house has been so besieged by visitors of late, I have decided upon the afternoon of January 10th (three to six p.m.) as an "At Home" to all who wish to see the fruits of my labour of the past two months. Those who would like to be present on the occasion of my children's tea and Christmas tree will please communicate with me, and I will forward tickets.

I regret "Rhineland" not being ready by Christmas. It must be a New Year's gift; while to me and my many kind friends it will be a pretty memento of my first act of public benevolence, and the best tribute I could offer to the memory of a kind friend of my youth, H.S.H. Prince Emil of Sayn-Wittgenstein.

SOCIAL POSITION.—H.I.H. Nicholas, Duke of Leuchtenberg; H.S.H. the Prince of Solms; H.S.H. Prince Albrecht of Solms; *H.S.H. Prince Emile of Sayn Wittgenstein; The Countess of Caithness; Hon. Alexander Aksakof, Imperial Councillor of Russia; the Hon. J. L. O'Sullivan, sometime Minister of U.S.A. at the Court of Lisbon; M. Favre-Chavairoz, late Consul-General of France at Trieste; the late Emperors of *Russia and *France; Presidents *Thiers, and *Lincoln, &c., &c.

Is it Conjuring?

It is sometimes confidently alleged that mediums are only clever conjurers, who easily deceive the simple-minded and unwary. But how, then, about the conjurers themselves, some of the most accomplished of whom have declared that the "manifestations" are utterly beyond the resources of their art?

ROBERT HOUDIN, the great French conjurer, investigated the subject of clairvoyance with the sensitive, Alexis Didier. In the result he unreservedly admitted that what he had observed was wholly beyond the resources of his art to explain. See "Psychische Studien" for January, 1878, p. 43.

PROFESSOR JACOBS, writing to the editor of Licht, Mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—"As a Prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the medianistic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect. Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. . . . Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also 'the individuality of the spirit' in Spiritual manifestation."

SAMUEL BELLACHINI, COURT CONJURER AT BERLIN.—I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne, Butleroff, in St. Petersburg; to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the "How" of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a Notary and witnesses.—(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI, Berlin, December 6th, 1877.

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By M.A. (Oxon.)

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct seances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two, of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex; the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential; and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful seance.

The first indications of success usually are a cool breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitching of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over but not in contact with it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous, and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form-manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly—Try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning Spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your Reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good, and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

WORKS BY "M.A. (OXON)."

Spirit Teachings. "M.A. (OXON)" new work. 291 pp. Price 10s. 6d. The work consists of a large number of messages communicated by automatic writing, and dealing with a variety of Religious, Ethical, and Social subjects of general interest. Among the subjects thus treated may be mentioned Mediumship and Spirit Control—Spheres and States of Spiritual Existence—The Spirit Creed: God, Heaven, Hell, Faith, Belief, Inspiration, Revelation—Orthodox Theology and Spirit Teaching—The Old Faith and the New—Spiritualized Christianity—Suicide and its Consequences—The Final Judgment of Souls—Capital Punishment—The Treatment of the Insane—The True Philanthropist, &c., &c., &c. The volume contains many cases of proof of the identity of communicating Spirits. The writer has connected the message by an autobiographical narrative, giving many details of personal experience.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"I cannot speak too highly of its great, and, I may say, its unrivalled merits."
"A book only for the initiated." "It is produced in a very high-class manner and is decidedly interesting."—Truthseeker.

Psychography. Second edition, with a new introductory chapter and other additional matter. Revised and brought down to date. Illustrated with diagrams. A collection of evidence of the reality of the phenomenon of writing without human agency, in a closed slate or other space, access to which by ordinary means is precluded. Cloth, demy 8vo., price 3s.

"The author is among the ablest advocates of Spiritualism in England, and everything he writes is valuable. A clear and thoughtful style: high scholastic culture and literary ability."—Religio-Philosophical Magazine.
"This invaluable little volume should take its place in the library of every earnest of wise investigators that should take its place in the library of every earnest Spiritualist."—Psychological Review.
"It is quite refreshing to read wise reflections and valuable suggestions on these topics from so able and logical a pen. In matters relating to Spiritualism, whatever 'M.A. (Oxon)' has undertaken to do, he has done well. In this little book he has done better than ever."—Spiritual Notes.

WORKS BY JOHN S. FARMER.

A New Basis of Belief in Immortality. This book was specially mentioned by Canon B. Wilberforce at the Church Congress. He said:—"The exact position claimed at this moment by the warmest advocates of Spiritualism is set forth ably and eloquently in a work by Mr. J. S. Farmer, published by E. W. Allen, and called 'A New Basis of Belief,' which, without necessarily endorsing, I commend to the perusal of my brethren."

Mr. S. C. Hall, F.S.A., and Editor of the Art Journal, says:—"Your book is both useful and interesting: a very serviceable addition to the literature of Spiritualism."—"One of the calmest and weightiest arguments, from the Spiritualists' side, ever issued. . . . Those desirous of knowing what can be said on this present-day question, by one of its ablest advocates, cannot do better than procure this volume."—Christian World. "This is an exceedingly thoughtful book: temperate, earnest, and bright with vivid and intelligent love of truth. Mr. Farmer is no fanatic, if we may judge of him by his book, but a brave seeker after the truth. . . . We commend this book to the attention of all who are prepared to give serious attention to a very serious subject."—Truthseeker. "Mr. Farmer writes clearly and forcibly."—Literary World. Printed on Superior Paper, Cloth, Bevelled Edges, with Portrait of Author. Present Day Problems.—Now in the Press, and will form a volume uniform in style with "Spirit Teachings." I.—Introductory: Giving brief resumé of the ground to be traversed, and present position of Psychological Science, embracing—(a) What is known based on personal observation; (b) What is believed on reasonable grounds; (c) What is speculation only; (d) The Tendency of Physical Science towards the Realm of Spirit. II.—Methods and modes of investigation, with suggestions. III.—General difficulties experienced by investigators (a) on Scientific grounds, (b) on Religious grounds. IV.—The Present Day Problems and their general bearing on Modern Thought. V.—Mesmerism: Its Rise, Progress, and Present Position. Recent Investigations, Comparison, and Analyses of Results, &c. VI.—Thought Transference. VII.—Clairvoyance. VIII.—Reichenbach's Researches and the Luminosity of the Magnetic Field. IX.—Apparitions, Hauntings, &c. X.—Spiritual Phenomena. XI.—Summary. This book is intended to present to the student of Psychological Science a succinct and bird's-eye view of the subjects enumerated, in each case narrating and discussing the results of recent research, and attempting to shew how each new development of science is bringing us nearer, step by step, to the Unseen Realm of Spirit. It advocates the existence of the Counterparts of Natural Laws in the Spiritual world, and proves by scientific methods that the Spiritual is not the projection upwards of the Natural; but that the Natural is the projection downwards of the Spiritual,—in short, that the Unseen World is the world of Causes, and this the world of Effects. The Author also endeavours to trace out some of the laws which appear to govern the abnormal phenomena with which he is concerned in this volume. The Publishers trust that the confidence shown in their previous Subscription Volumes will be extended to them in this one also, and they, therefore, offer it at the following terms:—To Subscribers only: Single Copies, 7s. 6d., or Three Copies for £1 0s. 0d. The book will be published at 10s. 6d.
